Graham Murray.*)

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS CIRCULATED WITH THE VOTES.

"The Times" in Government Departments.

MR. MARKHAM (Nottinghamshire, Mansfield): To ask the Secretary to the Treasury will he say which Government Department takes daily forty copies of The Times at the public expense.

(Answered by Mr. Victor Cavendish.) I understand that the Department alluded to is the Admiralty, which takes thirty-nine copies of The Times daily.

Electric Railways—Precautions for Public Safety.

MR. CHANNING (Northamptonshire, E.): To ask the President of the Board of Trade what Orders, if any, have been made by the Board under Section 1, Subsection (f), of The Railways (Electric Power) Act, 1903, for securing the safety of the public; whether such Orders include adequate protection from contact with a live rail; whether any of the fatal and other accidents which have occurred from contact with live rails have been found to be due to the neglect of the companies to comply with the terms of Orders of the Board, or to neglect of other precautions; and what steps the Board are now taking or will take to effectually prevent the recurrence of such accidents.

(Answered by Mr. Gerald Balfour.) No Orders have yet been made under the Act referred to. Inquiries are being held into two recent accidents that occurred through the electrical working of railways, and when the reports of these inquiries are received the question of the precautions to be taken will be fully considered.

Delay in Establishment of Telephone System between Ballymena and Londonderry.

MR. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.): To ask the Postmaster-General whether, sufficient support to warrant the introduction of the trunk telephone scheme being now forthcoming, he will say what is the cause of the delay in having communication established between Ballymena and Londonderry, including branches to Limavady, Coleraine, and Portrush; and when the subscribers in these towns may expect to be connected with Belfast.

(Answered by Lord Stanley.) Applications for a telephone service have been received from several other towns in the North of Ireland besides those mentioned by the hon. Member, and it has been necessary to obtain further estimates in order that the scheme now under consideration may be made as comprehensive as the circumstances will justify. I hope, however, very shortly to be able to announce the result and to have the work put in hand where the requisite support is forthcoming.

The Mutessarifliks of Selfidge and Koritza and the Muerzteg Agreement.

MR. MOON (St. Pancras, N.): To ask the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Mutessarifliks of Selfidge and Koritza, which are mostly inhabited by Christians of non-Slavonic origin, are at present excluded from the operation of the Muerzteg Agreement.

(Answered by Earl Percy.) This is at present the case so far as the reorganisation of the gendarmerie is concerned, but His Majesty's Ambassador has urged and will continue to urge that, as circumstances permit, the operation of this part of the scheme shall be further extended. In other respects the districts in question fall within the application of the scheme.

British Commercial Agent at Vladivostock.

MR. MOON: To ask the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the British commercial agent appointed to Vladivostock is remaining there; and, if not, where and how he is employed.

Commercial Treaty between the United States and Abyssinia.

MAJOR EVANS-GORDON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): To ask the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he has any information with regard to a commercial treaty recently concluded between the United States and Abyssinia; and, if so, whether such treaty contemplates any cessions of territorial or mining rights.

(Answered by Earl Percy.) His Majesty's Government are not able to give any information on the subject.

Value of Licensed Premises for Probate.

MR. CORBETT (Glasgow, Tradeston): To ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he will obtain from the Inland Revenue Department and state particulars of the last six cases, without necessarily mentioning names, where licensed premises have been valued for probate, showing, in each case, the total value at which the licensed premises were assessed, and the nature of the interest on such premises thus taxed; and the annual value at which such licensed premises were assessed for the purpose of the publican's licence duty.

(Answered by Mr. Victor Cavendish.) I will inquire how far it may be possible to supply such particulars as are asked for, and will let the hon. Member know the result as soon as possible.

Export of Coal above the Value of 6s. per Ton.

MR. CHARLES DOUGLAS (Lanarkshire, N.W.): To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer what quantity of coal, valued at not more than 6s. per ton f.o.b., was shipped for export from this country during the twelve months ending 31st December, 1903.

(Answered by Mr. Austen Chamberlain.) The total quantity of coal of a declared value not exceeding 6s. per ton f.o.b. exported during the twelve months ended 31st December, 1903, was 4,550,332 tons.

Income-Tax Inquiry—Exemption of Co-operative Societies.

MR. LOUIS SINCLAIR (Essex, Romford): To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he intends to carry out the promise made by the ex-Chancellor of the Exchequer last year to appoint a Departmental Committee to consider the practice with regard to income-tax payment; and, if so, whether the question of co-operative societies' exemption will be considered by the Committee.

(Answered by Mr. Austen Chamberlain.) A Committee was appointed two months ago, and the names of the members and the terms of reference have been publicly notified on several occasions. It is for the Committee to consider whether any questions relating to the position of co-operative societies come within their reference.

Duty-Free Spirits under Section 8 of Finance Act, 1902.

MR. LOUIS SINCLAIR: To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will grant a Return showing how far the exemption as to duty-free spirits by the power granted by Section 8 of the Finance Act of 1902 has been taken advantage of.

(Answered by Mr. Austen Chamberlain.) If the hon. Member will send me the form which he would like the Return to take, I will look into it and see whether it can be granted.

Liquor and Drug Traffic in India.

MR. HERBERT ROBERTS (Denbighshire, W.): To ask the Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been directed to the reference in the Financial Statement of the Government of India for 1904-5 (page 6), to the continued increase in the revenue derived from the sale of intoxicating liquors or drugs, and to the announcement that the Government of India were devoting special attention to this matter in the interests of temperance; whether the action of the Government of India in this direction has taken the form of an official inquiry; and whether further legislation for the purpose of checking the increasing consumption of alcohol and drugs in India is contemplated.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Brodrick.) I have seen the passage in question. I am not aware that any general inquiry is contemplated. A good many specific questions regarding the working of the Excise system in different parts of India have closely engaged the attention of the Government of India and the Local Governments, and various improvements have been effected. Excise Amendment Acts have lately been enacted in Burma and Bengal, and further legislation is in progress in Bengal.

Capture of Illig—Explosive Bullets.

MR. JOHN REDMOND (Waterford): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether he has any official Reports showing that at the bombardment and capture of Illig explosive bullets were used by the English forces.

White Labour in Transvaal Gold Mines.

MR. HERBERT SAMUEL (Yorkshire, Cleveland): To ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies if he will state what was the number of white men employed in the Transvaal gold mines in the latest month for which returns are available.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Lyttelton.) The latest return of the number of white men employed in the Transvaal gold mines is that for April, 1904, 12,740, who were at work on the last full working day.

Education (Scotland) Bill.

SIR J. STIRLING - MAXWELL (Glasgow, College): To ask the First Lord of the Treasury when the Education (Scotland) Bill will be taken.

(Answered by Mr. A. J. Balfour.) I am afraid I cannot at present fix the day for resuming the discussion in Committee on this Bill.

QUESTIONS IN THE HOUSE.

Army Clothing Factory—Atmosphere in Pressing Rooms.

MR. SHACKLETON (Lancashire, Clitheroe): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether he can state what is the proportion of carbon dioxide in each 10,000 volumes of air in each of the six pressing rooms at the Army Clothing Factory.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. BROMLEY DAVENPORT, Cheshire, Macclesfield): Samples of air were taken last Friday from three rooms at the factory including one of the pressing rooms (being the room in which Alice Wright pressed her work). The proportion of carbonic acid in the press-room varied from 5·7 per 10,000 volumes at the south end to 9·0 at the north end. The samples were taken after the workers had been at work three to four hours, and the result was considered satisfactory by the District Factory Inspector.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that notice was given of the intended visit of the Factory Inspector; that the rooms were in consequence cleared in the morning contrary to usage; that they were sprinkled with water contrary to usage also, and that the irons were cooled?

MR. BROMLEY DAVENPORT: No, Sir, I am not aware of that, but I will inquire, and if necessary there shall be another test.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE: I do not suggest that the atmosphere was not as the hon. Member has suggested, because I do not know.

CAPTAIN NORTON (Newington, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether, in view of the fact that on 1st May, 1902,† the Financial Secretary to the War Office stated in reply to a Question as to improving the accommodation in the pressing rooms of the Royal Army Clothing Factory, that the number of persons employed on pressing irons was 1,348, he will take immediate steps to improve the ventilation since these persons are now in the rooms in considerable numbers from time to time, although they are not constantly employed there.

In putting this Question the hon. and gallant Member asked leave to explain that it was by inadvertence on a former occasion he omitted the date of the year when the Question was put and thus incurred the censure of Mr. Speaker.

MR. BROMLEY DAVENPORT: In May, 1902, it was stated that before the war 1,348 women used the pressing irons, which then numbered about 170. At the present time there are 1,314 women using 180 pressing irons. The women only use the pressing irons occasionally, the time spent in the pressing rooms varying from one to two hours per week. My right hon. friend stated on Monday ‡ in reply to a Question that measures are being taken and will very shortly be completed to improve the atmospheric condition of certain of the rooms.

The Mowatt Committee's Report.

MR. BUCHANAN (Perthshire, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War when the summary of the Mowatt Committee's Report, stating its proposals and how far they had been adopted by Ministers, as promised by him, will be in the hands of Members.

MR. BROMLEY DAVENPORT: In reply to the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition, in debate on 9th March,§ the Secretary of State for War stated that such a summary could be published in lieu of the whole Report, but as the right hon. Gentleman did not press for such summary no further steps were taken in the matter. If the hon. Member now desires to have it published the measures necessary shall be taken.

Recruitment of Chinese Coolies for the Transvaal.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been called to the advertisement in Chinese of the terms of contract which appeared in the China Times of 29th March last, and which purported to contain and to explain the provisions of the Labour Ordinance under which the Chinese coolies were to be recruited; whether he is aware that in this advertisement no mention was made of the following points: that the labourer is to be compulsorily repatriated at the end of his term of service; that the work will be underground work; that the labourer is to be confined to a compound; and that he is prohibited from trading or from owning property; and will he state whether all mention of the right of the labourer to be accompanied by his wife and children was omitted; and whether the rate of wages for day work was not stated to be 25s. per calendar month; and whether any Chinese coolies were recruited under the terms of this advertisement.

I beg also to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies on whose authority the advertisement in the Chinese Times of 29th March last, relating to the terms of engagement of the Chinese coolies, was drawn up and inserted; and whether he will have the advertisement at once withdrawn, and advertisements issued which will give a full and truthful statement of the conditions of contract.

† See (4) Debates, cvii., 425.

§ See (4) Debates, cxxxi., 636.

MR. CHARLES ALLEN (Gloucestershire, Stroud): At the same time may I ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been called to advertisements in the Chinese language, which have been recently circulated in the provinces of Shantung and Chihli, inviting coolies to go to South Africa, which do not inform them that they will have to work underground in the deep levels, do not inform them that they will have to live in a compound, which make no mention of the system of fines and penalties incurred by those leaving the compounds without leave, and which give the wages to be paid in pounds and not in dollars; and, if so, what steps the Government propose to take to prevent the circulation of such advertisements.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. LYTTELTON, Warwick and Leamington): My attention has not been called to this advertisement, and if any coolies were recruited under it, they must have had the conditions of the contract fully explained to them before they signed it. With reference to the hon. Member's second Question on this subject, I am not aware by whose authority this advertisement was issued, but it was apparently drawn up before the conditions were finally settled, and if it has not been long since withdrawn I will certainly at once direct that this shall be done.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman make inquiry if the original advertisement did contain the conditions; and if any coolies were actually recruited under it, and will he state what action will be taken with regard to coolies obviously recruited under misstatements.

Beri-beri in the Transvaal.

MR. HERBERT SAMUEL (Yorkshire, Cleveland): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he is yet able to state the cause and extent of the outbreak of beri-beri among the Chinese coolies engaged for the Transvaal, and the methods adopted to prevent its spread.

MR. LYTTELTON: Lord Milner has telegraphed: "Tweeddale arrived with forty cases of beri-beri. Three deaths took place at sea from this cause, and five at Durban. Remaining cases were sent back to China at once in Tweeddale. Since arrival of labourers on Rand twenty-five cases have occurred, and one death from heart failure. All remaining cases isolated in lazaretto and likely to recover. Neither medical officers nor labourers themselves have smallest anxiety about this outbreak, and former express opinion that general health of this batch is surprisingly good. Full report on arrival, landing, and despatch of coolies will go to you by next mail and I will keep you fully informed as to their health."

MR. HERBERT SAMUEL: Will an inquiry be made into the cause of the outbreak?

MR. LYTTELTON: The hon. Member had better put that Question down. No doubt an inquiry has been made.

DR. MACNAMARA (Camberwell, N.): Will the right hon. Gentleman give us the date of the despatch of the telegram by Lord Milner, and the date of its receipt at the Colonial Office?

MR. LYTTELTON: I deal with that in answer to another Question.

CAPTAIN NORTON: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies if he can state the date upon which the first Chinese coolies arrived at Durban; the date upon which the first case of beri-beri broke out, and what steps, if any, were taken to combat the disease; also, the date upon which he telegraphed to Lord Milner for information upon these matters; and what has been the result of his inquiry.

MR. LYTTELTON: The Tweeddale arrived at Durban on the 18th inst. I am not aware of the date on which the disease broke out, but only that three deaths took place at sea. I telegraphed to Lord Milner on the 23rd instant, but the telegram was written and settled on the 22nd, and I was informed that it was despatched on the morning of that day.

It was, however, by an accident not despatched till the 23rd. I again telegraphed to Lord Milner on the 25th and 27th. As to the other points referred to in the hon. and gallant Member's Question, I must refer him to the telegram which I have just read.

DR. MACNAMARA: What was the date of the dispatch by Lord Milner of his telegram?

MR. LYTTELTON: I saw it for the first time this morning. I believe it arrived last night, but I cannot say with certainty.

DR. MACNAMARA: I will put another Question.

The Landing of Coolies at Durban.

DR. MACNAMARA: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies if he is now in a position to make a statement on the circumstances attending the landing at Durban, under armed surveillance, of Chinese coolies indentured under the Transvaal Ordinance.

MR. LYTTELTON: No, Sir. As I have already intimated, Lord Milner has promised a report by mail.

DR. MACNAMARA: May I ask whether the right hon. Gentleman, as promised, has requested Lord Milner for a reply by cable to this Question?

MR. LYTTELTON: I do not recollect having promised to ask for a cabled reply. Will the hon. Gentleman quote my words?

DR. MACNAMARA: It was in reply to a Question by the hon. Member for Poplar.

*MR. SPEAKER: It is not in order to discuss a Question and Answer given on a previous day.

DR. MACNAMARA: I desire to know whether Lord Milner was requested by cable to send the report as the Colonial Secretary promised on Thursday.

MR. LYTTELTON: I thought the hon. Member was asking whether I applied for a telegraphic reply. I did not ask by cable for a report by mail.

Present number of Chinese Coolies in South Africa.

DR. MACNAMARA: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies how many Chinese coolies—men, women, and children—have arrived in South Africa up to date.

MR. LYTTELTON: I have not been as yet informed by Lord Milner of the numbers which have arrived. They are stated in the newspapers to be rather more than 1,000.

DR. MACNAMARA: Will the right hon. Gentleman secure from Lord Milner information as to the number respectively of men, women, and children?

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon Boroughs): By cable.

MR. LYTTELTON: I have not received the numbers.

MR. HERBERT SAMUEL: Does the 1,000 already there include any women or children?

*MR. SPEAKER: If these particulars are wanted they should have been asked for.

MR. HERBERT SAMUEL: They are asked for, Sir.

DR. MACNAMARA: I have asked for the number of men, women, and children, and now I ask the right hon. Gentleman if he will get that information from Lord Milner.

MR. SPEAKER: If the hon. Gentleman will look at the way the Question is printed he will see that what he asked for was the total number of Chinese coolies, and then in brackets were the words "men, women, and children." He has not asked for them separately.

DR. MACNAMARA rose to put a further Question, but was met with shouts of "Order!"

*MR. SPEAKER: If the hon. Gentleman wishes to have separate figures they should be asked for. It is quite obvious that a Minister cannot bring down all these separate figures unless he is asked for them.

DR. MACNAMARA: I have definitely asked for specific figures.

*MR. SPEAKER: I did not so read it, and it seems that the Colonial Secretary did not so read it.

DR. MACNAMARA: Very well, Sir, I will put it down in a more specific form.

South African Constabulary.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies what was the original intention of His Majesty's Government as to the strength of the South African Constabulary; and what is the present strength.

MR. LYTTELTON: The intention was to have a police force of six thousand men. The present authorised strength is 5,000. The actual strength is for the moment rather less. Lord Milner is satisfied that a force of 5,000 is adequate for police purposes.

Sale of Intoxicating Liquor and Drugs in India.

MR. HERBERT ROBERTS (Denbighshire, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether he is aware that the number of shops open for the sale of intoxicating liquor and drugs in India rose from 97,910 in 1901–2 to 99,497 in 1902–3; that the net revenue on liquor and drugs consumed in India for the year 1902–3 was £4,741,000, an increase of £502,000 on the figures for 1900–1; and that in the last financial statement of the Government of India a further increase of £498,800 is anticipated during the current year; and whether he is in a position to explain the reasons for this increase in the number of shops opened and the consequent increase in consumption.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): The increase in the number of shops was considerable only in the two provinces of Bengal and the Central Provinces. In Bengal it was chiefly due to the fact that many shops sanctioned but unlet in 1901–2 were let in 1902–3; and in the Central Provinces to the Government taking over the Excise arrangements in certain semi-feudatory areas and to the consequent more strict enforcement of the law. As the increase of revenue in 1902–3 over 1901–2 in these two provinces was not marked, the additional shops could not have had much effect on consumption.

Concessions to the East Africa Syndicate.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the East Africa Syndicate has exercised any of the rights or options secured to it on the concessions which appear as granted to it in the White Paper, 2nd April, of 1903; whether this syndicate has been granted subsequently any further concessions in Uganda and East Africa either in regard to minerals or land; and, if so, what is their scope, and what consideration has been received for them; and whether any company or syndicate has been granted, since the above White Paper was laid upon the Table of the House, any land, or property, or mining concessions; and, if so, what is their nature, and what are the names of the concessionaires.

THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Earl PERCY, Kensington, S.): The only agreements actually concluded with the East Africa Syndicate are for leases of land, particulars of which will be found in the Papers shortly to be laid before Parliament. These Returns will, it is hoped, also give all the desired information in regard to concessions generally both in East Africa and Uganda.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): Will these agreements be subject to ratification by Parliament or are they final?

EARL PERCY; They do not require ratification by Parliament.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: Then they are final?

EARL PERCY: Yes.

Finance Regulations—Issues from the Consolidated Fund.

Mr. EDMUND ROBERTSON (Dundee): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the issues from the Consolidated Fund for Supply Services are governed by the provisions of The Exchequer and Audit Departments Act, 1866, or whether the provisions of any later Act apply; whether the money granted by a Consolidated Fund Act to meet the expenditure authorised by Resolutions in Supply for Civil Services can, under any circumstances, be used for Army or Navy Services; whether the money granted by Consolidated Fund Act, No. 1, of this session for Naval Services is available to meet the expenditure authorised by Resolutions in Supply for Naval Services since the passing of that Act, and is the only money so available; and how much of the money so granted remains unissued up to the present time.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER (Mr. Austen Chamberlain, Worcestershire, E.): The issues for Supply Services are made in accordance with the provisions of the Exchequer and Audit Departments Act, 1866, and of Section 2 (1) of the Public Accounts and Charges Act, 1891. The money granted by a Consolidated Fund Act is not allocated to any particular head of Supply Services, unless the Act be also an Appropriation Act. The Consolidated Fund (No. 1) Act of the present session authorised the issue of the sum of £39,571,200, to be applied "towards making good the Supply granted to His Majesty for the service of the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1905." The Act does not allocate the money between the various Supply Services, and it will not be so allocated until the Appropriation Act is passed. The unissued balance under the Consolidated Fund (No. 1) Act is £15,521,500, and that balance can be made available for any Votes which the House has granted, either before or since the passing of the Act, for Army, Navy, or Civil Services.

Mr. GIBSON BOWLES: The right hon. Gentleman has quoted the Public Accounts and Charges Act. Is he aware that under that Act issues are restricted to making good the Supply that was granted at the time of the last issue? Is that consistent with his present Answer?

Mr. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: I think the hon. Gentlemen had better put that Question down.

Mr. EDMUND ROBERTSON: May I give notice that I propose to call attention to this matter on Report of Supply, when perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will take the opportunity to explain more fully the exact consequences of the present position.

Mr. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: I think I have given all the information that is in my power subject to the point raised by the hon. Member for Lynn Regis.

The New Taxes.

Mr. EDMUND ROBERTSON: I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the new taxes proposed in the Finance Bill now under the consideration of the House are already being enforced by the collecting Departments; whether this is in accordance with the usual practice; and whether there is any legal authority for such a practice.

Mr. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: The Answer to the first two paragraphs is in the affirmative. The authority for the practice is its long existence and its recognition in a succession of Budget Acts. It further obtained special recognition by 39 and 40 Vict., Chap. 36, Section 18.

Workmen's Compensation for Accidents Act Amendment Bill.

Mr. HERBERT SAMUEL: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will state when he proposes to introduce the Bill to amend the Workmen's Compensation for Accidents Act; and whether any endeavour will be made to pass the Bill this session.

The UNDER-SECRETARY of STATE for the HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. Cochrane, Ayrshire, N.): As I have already intimated in reply to a previous Question from the hon. Member,† I can make no definite statement as to the date of the introduction of the Bill until I have received and considered the Report of the Committee which has been inquiring into the subject. I understand that the Committee have found the inquiry more laborious than was anticipated, but they have now been at work for some time on their Report, and I hope it may be in my hands within the next few weeks.

† See (4) Debates, cxxxiii., 531.

Rattigan's Estate, Edgeworthstown.

MR. J. P. FARRELL (Longford, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland what steps the authorities intend taking in the execution of decrees on the estate of Mr. Rattigan, of Camlirk House, Edgeworthstown; whether he is aware that the tenants have declared their intention to resist the execution by every means in their power; and whether, in the interest of the peace of the district, he will refuse to lend the forces of the Crown to carry out these executions.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. WYNDHAM, Dover): This is a small property, the rental of which is considerably below the Poor Law valuation. There are twenty-one tenants, all of whom, except four, have paid their rents. Civil bill decrees have been obtained against the latter. If protection is requisitioned for their execution it will, of course, be afforded.

Mrs. Ledwith's Estate, County Longford.

MR. J. P. FARRELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is prepared to advise the Estates Commissioners to purchase for striping amongst tenants of Currool-Fox, Currool Kenny, and Currool Brennan the farm of Dernageas, in the barony of Rathclive, county Longford, on the estate of Mrs. Harriett Ledwith, whose agent is Mr. Webb, Corngard, Boyle, county Roscommon; whether he is aware that the landlady is willing and anxious to sell this farm for the benefit of the tenants; and whether, as Newtowncashel parish, in which this farm is situate, may be described as a congested district, he will advise the Estates Commissioners to expend money on the reclamation, fencing, and division of this farm.

MR. WYNDHAM: The Estates Commissioners have not received any application from the owner of this estate. Should it be offered to the Commissioners they will consider the question of its improvement and division.

Irish Agricultural Organisation Society.

MR. MURPHY (Kerry, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland what is the annual amount paid to the Irish Agricultural Organisation Society by the Department of Agriculture and Technical Instruction; and what was the amount of the last payment, and to whom was it made.

MR. WYNDHAM: No fixed annual grant is paid. The Department occasionally utilises the services of some of the Society's officers who have expert qualifications in such subjects as egg packing, poultry rearing, fruit growing, and bee keeping; and they also use the services of two of the Society's organisers in connection with the organisation of Agricultural Banks. The total amount paid by the Department to the Society in this connection in the year ended 31st March last, was £4,262 3s. 6d. The last payment, one of £100, was made on the 18th instant.

MR. MURPHY: Having regard to the fact that this organisation is competing unfairly with similar organisations——

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The Question on the Paper has been fully answered, and the hon. Member is now seeking to raise an entirely fresh point.

Party Demonstrations in Ulster.

MR. VINCENT KENNEDY (Cavan, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether, with a view of preventing breaches of the peace at forthcoming demonstrations in some districts in Ulster, he will take steps to prevent the holding of such demonstrations.

MR. WYNDHAM: The steps hitherto adopted for the maintenance of the public peace on such occasions will continue to be followed.

Irish Department of Agriculture—Officers' Salaries and Travelling Expenses

Mr. MURPHY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland what is the amount estimated for 1904–5 for new officers appointed under the Department of Agriculture and Technical Instruction, and the sum required to cover travelling expenses for same; and what is the additional amount that will be required for salaries and expenses of transferred officers.

Mr. WYNDHAM: For the salaries of new officers appointed since the establishment of the Department a sum of £25,469 is provided. The provision for their travelling expenses and subsistence allowances amounts to £5,050. In respect of officers transferred to the Department the provision for salaries amounts to £47,335, and for travelling and other allowances £2,950.

Woodwork Instruction in Irish Schools.

Mr. J. F. X. O'BRIEN (Cork): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland how long it will take to train the twenty young men recently selected by the Department of Agriculture (Ireland) for admission to the course of instruction in the manual training (woodwork) so as to qualify them to give instruction in woodwork, as itinerant instructors under county schemes, in the technical schools which are now being organised throughout Ireland, or in day secondary schools, under the conditions of the Department's regulations for such schools; how long will it take the instructors so trained to impart adequate instruction to the boys and girls in the Irish schools; is the Department considering how best to utilise the acquirements of the children so trained; whether, considering the lack of enterprise in Ireland, steps will be taken for employing the trained children in various industries; whether the Department has power to initiate such industries; and, if not, whether he will consider the desirability of giving such power to the Department, or to some other body.

Mr. WYNDHAM: The course of training for these teachers will last six months. The time limits of the course to be given to pupils by the instructors when trained must necessarily vary according to circumstances. The object of the courses is educational, i.e., to form habits which will be of value to the pupils whatever may be their subsequent career in life. As regards the latter part of the Question, the Department's function with respect to industries other than those specified in Section 30 (1) of the Act of 1899, is to provide assistance by means of technical instruction, and to afford information and expert advice.

Kingston Estate.

Mr. WILLIAM ABRAHAM (Cork County, N.E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he can state whether any application has yet been made to the Estates Commissioners to declare a section of the Kingston Estate to be a separate estate, the tenants on such portion having been induced to sign agreements for purchase; whether he is aware that processes for payment of a year's rent have been issued against other tenants who, finding themselves unable to accept the landlord's terms, have refused to sign agreements; and if the Estates Commissioners will investigate the circumstances of the tenants on this estate, before creating any section of it a separate estate, or sanctioning advances for purchase of holdings on a portion of it.

Mr. WYNDHAM: No application has been received by the Commissioners in reference to any portion of this estate. If made all the circumstances will be considered.

Constables' Lodging-out Allowances at Millstreet.

Mr. SHEEHAN (Cork County, Mid.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will state what are the results of his inquiries in o the lodging-out allowances granted to seven members of the Royal Irish Constabulary stationed at Millstreet, notwithstanding that there should be a sufficiency of accommodation for them in the barracks; and, seeing that Millstreet and Ballyvourney were formerly included in the Macroom police district, will he consider the desirability of again attaching them to that station, and thus effect a substantial economy.

Mr. WYNDHAM: There is no accommodation for married men at the Millstreet barracks. The district inspector resides in one portion of the building. The nine remaining apartments are occupied by eight men. The question of abolishing the station as a district headquarters will be considered hereafter; at present it is considered premature to discontinue the station.

Arbitrator's Award for Land for Labourers' Cottages in the Castleblayney Union.

Mr. McKEAN (Monaghan, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if his attention has been called to an award, dated the 30th March last, made by Mr. Lawder, of Ballinamore, in his capacity as arbitrator, appointed by the Local Government Board, in the case of a proposed erection of cottages under the Labourers Acts in the Castleblayney union, in which award he allowed the owners the sum of £18 for ninety statute perches (an amount equal to thirty years purchase), at the same time reducing the occupier's rent by the sum of 12s., in addition to allowing said occupier £8 10s. for his interest, and £1 5s. for severance; and whether, seeing that Mr. Robert Haire, arbitrator on a former occasion, allowed the same owners only £11 5s. for a similar sized plot in the same field, he will take steps to secure that Mr. Lawder, being himself a landlord, shall not be employed as an arbitrator in such cases.

Mr. WYNDHAM: Mr. Lawder made his award on the basis of the facts deposed to by the claimant, and not disputed by the representatives of the district council who were present, namely, that he, the claimant, had, in respect of the plot, received £9 compensation at the former arbitration, and an abatement of 12s. in his rent. Mr. Lawder is confident his award is right. He is a very extensive farmer, a small landowner, and a civil engineer of much experience and high qualifications, fully competent to decide such matters. The reply to the last query is in the negative.

Mr. McKEAN: I must say the answer is not satisfactory. [Cries of "Order."] Is the right hon. Gentleman not aware that the amount awarded was £18, not £9.

Mr. WYNDHAM: My information is that it was £9.

Inspection of Weights and Measures—Ballymahan Grievance.

Mr. J. P. FARRELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can explain the action of Sergeant M'Gettrick, of the Royal Irish Constabulary force at Ballymahan, in requiring traders in that town to send in their weights and measures to be tested on a market day, thus inconveniencing these persons; and will a caution be sent to the sergeant to select a less inconvenient time on future occasions.

Mr. WYNDHAM: The sergeant adjusted weights and measures on various dates between the 11th and 23rd June. Two of these days were market days, on which nine traders sent in their weights. No complaints of inconvenience were made, and the nine traders in question might have sent in their weights on six other appointed days which were not market days.

Mr. J. P. FARRELL: If this is the practice of the sergeant, will the right hon. Gentleman direct him to choose other days?

Mr. WYNDHAM: I think it can hardly be described as his practice.

Millstreet Police—Lodging Allowances.

Mr. SHEEHAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that there are seven married constables stationed in Millstreet in receipt of lodging allowances, and that one of these resides in the police barrack; and, if so, will he state under what rule or order he receives a lodging allowance.

Mr. WYNDHAM: Two of the married constables at Millstreet in receipt of the lodging allowance live in barracks, although their families are accommodated outside. The allowance of 2s. a week is payable under the rules of the force for the families of married men not accommodated in barracks.

Upkeep of Banks on Sir R. Blennerhassett's Killorglin Estate.

Mr. THOMAS O'DONNELL (Kerry, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Irish Land Commission is responsible for the upkeep of the banks on the estate of Sir R. Blennerhassett, Douglas, Killorglin, Kerry, purchased by the tenants in 1886; if not, who is responsible; whether he is aware that the tenants on the estate have suffered loss and inconvenience during the past twelve months from the inflow of the tide; and whether steps will at once be taken to have the tenants' property protected.

Mr. WYNDHAM: The Commissioners recently directed an inspector to visit the embankment in question. The inspector's report was received yesterday, and will be considered by the Commissioners.

Irish Assistant Teachers' Pay.

Mr. THOMAS O'DONNELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether, considering the work done by assistant teachers in Irish national schools and the remuneration they get for their services, he will place on the Estimate a sum of £8,000, the amount calculated to give assistants of ten years service, and classed under old rules, second or higher second grade salary.

Mr. WYNDHAM: I can hold out no hope that this suggestion will be adopted. There is no analogy between the proposal and the reduction to fifty of the average required for an assistant teacher, the cost of which it is proposed to place on the Development Grant Estimate. Under the existing rules increases of income are awarded to teachers as the result of continued good service, and the adopting of the hon. Member's proposal would be opposed to the principle underlying the new system of payments.

Upkeep of Embankments on Estates adjoining the Sea.

Mr. THOMAS O'DONNELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland when estates adjoining the sea, the banks of which before sale were kept in order by the landlord, are sold to the tenants, what authority will be responsible for the proper upkeep of those banks during the next sixty-eight and a half years.

Mr. WYNDHAM: In cases not coming within Section 4 of the Land Act of 1903 the tenant purchasers should keep up these embankments for their own protection. There is no obligation on the landlord or the State to do so.

Belfast Smallpox Outbreak.

Mr. JOSEPH DEVLIN (Kilkenny, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that recently there has been a serious outbreak of smallpox in the City of Belfast; whether he can furnish any particulars as to the cause and extent of the outbreak; whether his attention has been called to the neglect of the Belfast City Council to ensure an efficient exercise of its powers under the Public Health Acts, and the custom sanctioned by the council of permitting all kinds of refuse to be dumped on ground intended for building purposes; whether he is aware that a number of cottages abutting on the workhouse cemetery in Donegal Road, Belfast, where upwards of ten thousand have been interred, are overcrowded and without any system of drainage; and whether, under the circumstances, he will bring pressure to bear upon the city council in order to secure an immediate remedy for this state of affairs.

Mr. WYNDHAM: The total number of cases admitted to the smallpox hospital is ninety-three. Two have died; fifty-five have been discharged; and thirty-six remain under treatment. The disease is supposed to have been introduced from Scotland. The Belfast Corporation, in the opinion of the Local Government Board, efficiently discharges the duties devolving upon it as the sanitary authority. Every effort is being made to prevent the further spread of the disease. No complaints have been made to the Board in respect to the alleged dumping of refuse or the overcrowding of cottages.

Constable Anderson, Royal Irish Constabulary.

MR. CHARLES CRAIG (Antrim, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will state what communication had passed between Sir Antony MacDonnell and the Rev. Denis O'Hara, with reference to the Anderson case prior to Sir Antony MacDonnell's official approval of Anderson's dismissal on 23rd January, 1904; and through what channels.

MR. WYNDHAM: Except on one occasion, no communications, verbal or written, with reference to the case of Constable Anderson passed, prior to his dismissal, between Sir Antony MacDonnell and the Rev. Denis O'Hara, who is, I should like to say, an esteemed colleague of my own on the Congested Districts Board, for whose services and character I have a warm regard. This was the occasion: At a meeting of the Congested Districts Board, Father O'Hara informed Sir Antony MacDonnell that he had applied for the removal from Kiltimagh of a constable, and asked him to look into the matter. Sir Antony MacDonnell replied that he would inquire from the Inspector-General on the subject. He did inquire from the Deputy Inspector-General—the Inspector-General being on leave at the time—what the matter was about. He was informed that a Court of Inquiry had been, or was being, appointed by the Inspector-General. Sir Antony MacDonnell heard nothing further in the case until the Inspector-General's recommendation that Anderson should be dismissed came before him in the usual official course.

MR. CHARLES CRAIG: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland what additional evidence of Constable Anderson's innocence, if any, was obtained between the date of the letter of 23rd January, approved of by Sir Antony MacDonnell, confirming his dismissal from the force, and the date of his reinstatement; and, if no such additional evidence was forthcoming, did Sir Antony MacDonnell concur in Anderson's reinstatement without it.

MR. WYNDHAM: Sir, I would refer my hon. friend to many previous replies given by me on the 13th, 15th, and 20th June,† and to the opinion which I have expressed, and now repeat, viz., that if further debate on this question is desired by my hon. friend, or any other hon. Member, it can be conducted more conveniently on the Vote for my salary than by way of Question and Answer. I should be glad of an opportunity to defend the exercise of my discretion and the action of the Inspector-General, if these are attacked; and to repudiate charges against Sir Antony MacDonnell and the Rev. Denis O'Hara if these are preferred. That opportunity is not to be found within the limitations of separate replies to a series of argumentative Questions; and I must respectfully decline to continue this controversy except by way of debate in Committee of Supply under conditions which would admit of my dealing fully with the whole matter.

MR. JOSEPH DEVLIN: On behalf of the hon. Member for East Mayo I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the district inspector and sergeant at Rossport, county Mayo, were asked to report on Constable Anderson's record while he was stationed there; and, if so, what was the nature of their reports.

MR. WYNDHAM: I have given very fully all the grounds upon which the Inspector-General, Sir N. Chamberlain, recommended the dismissal of this constable, and all the grounds upon which I recommended his reinstatement. They were confined in each case to specific charges preferred in connection with Constable Anderson's conduct when stationed at Kiltimagh. It would not, in my opinion, be proper for me to enlarge that issue now by taking note of other matters or allegations unconnected with those charges. But, in any case, I must respectfully decline to discuss the existence or character of confidential instructions and reports on matters of discipline in the Royal Irish Constabulary.

MR. JOSEPH DEVLIN: On behalf of the hon. Member for East Mayo, I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether, when constable Anderson was removed from Rossport to Mullaghmore, the police at these stations got instructions to note every time Constable Anderson was seen in the neighbourhood of Rossport.

† See (4) Debates, cxxxv., 1497, cxxxvi., 147, 486.

Inquiry into the Incidence of Taxation.

Mr. CHANNING (Northamptonshire, E): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will assent to the Motion for a Select Committee to inquire into the Incidence of Taxation standing on this day's Paper.

The PRIME MINISTER and FIRST LORD of the TREASURY (Mr. A. J. Balfour, Manchester, E.): I doubt whether any useful purpose would be served by appointing a Select Committee with regard to this matter. It is an extremely complex problem, and I do not think that a Select Committee would advance it further than the learned professors who have already dealt with it have been able to do. It is my personal belief that when a strictly scientific question of this kind has to be investigated the appointment of a Select Committee is an indifferent way of arriving at an agreement.

Mr. CHANNING: Do I understand the right hon. Gentleman dissents from the proposal to have an inquiry, whether by Select Committee or in any other way? Does he not accept the principle of inquiry?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: It is not a question of principle but of expediency. So far as I can see, very little would be gained by an inquiry. Nothing would be learned from it except what can now be learned by any patient student of economic theory.

The Motion referred to is as follows:—Incidence of Taxation: That a Select Committee be appointed to consider the relative incidence of Imperial Taxation on the various Classes and Incomes of the Population, and to report what readjustments are possible and advisable, with a view to secure that the contributions of all Classes and Incomes shall be more exactly proportioned to their taxable capacity.

Blocking Motions.

Mr. JOHN ELLIS (Nottinghamshire, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he proposes to take steps to restore to the House that full freedom of discussing urgent matters of public importance of which it has now been largely deprived owing to the operation of Motions placed on the Paper with the design of preventing such discussion.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot say that in the matter of Motions for adjournment I have seen any extraordinary restriction on the use of the privileges of the House during the last few weeks. With regard to the Question on the Paper, I have more than once answered Questions of precisely similar import, and I have nothing to add to what I have already said.

Mr. JOHN ELLIS: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that there is a Motion down which prevents a discussion even of the question of blocking Motions.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: We might have blocking Motion on blocking Motion ad infinitum. I do not see how the House could with advantage discuss the question of blocking Motions except in reference to some proposed amendment of the Standing Orders, and I have already explained that I do not propose in the present session to bring before the House any Rule dealing with the general question.

Mr. GIBSON BOWLES: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that there is nothing in the Standing Orders relating to this matter? It is a question of the general practice of the House. Is the right hon. Gentleman prepared to give time for the discussion of a Resolution which would correct the practice of the House in order to avoid these blocking methods?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: There may be nothing in the Standing Orders, but it would require a Standing Order to correct the common practice of the House, and I do not think it would be desirable to give a day for such a discussion in the present state of public business.

Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs): But the right hon. Gentleman has indicated his willingness to remove the effect of blocking Motions from Motions for adjournment for the holidays and other occasions of that kind. Will he say whether he will be able to bring forward a scheme for that purpose during the present session?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I could not find time for such a Motion unless it is passed with the general assent of the House and without discussion.

Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Will the right hon. Gentleman put such a proposal on the Paper, so that the House may judge whether it can agree to it?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes, I think that is a very fair request.

Mr. LABOUCHERE: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will grant an opportunity to the Member for Coventry to bring forward the Motion that stands in his name in regard to labour in Africa. I beg to say I put this Question direct to the right hon. Gentleman at the special request of the hon. Member for Coventry.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR. My view is that of all subjects which the House has shown its desire to discuss, this, perhaps, is the one which has been most fully discussed during the course of the present session, and when I remember that it can be again debated on the Colonial Vote, it seems to me that it will be impossible for the Government so far to violate ordinary practice as to give a special opportunity for discussing a private Member's Resolution upon it.

The Finance Bill.

Mr. WHITLEY (Halifax): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he can now state when the consideration of the Finance Bill will be resumed.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: We shall not finish the Committee stage of the Finance Bill until we come to the concluding stage of the Licensing Bill.

Mr. WHITLEY: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the trade concerned is completely at a standstill meantime, and does he really propose to allow that state of things to go on for five weeks.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I hope things are not so bad as the hon. Gentleman seems to suggest. If they are I hope he will give us his sedulous and earnest support in hurrying matters forward.

Mr. BUCHANAN: Is there any precedent for postponing the Committee stage of the Finance Bill to the end of July.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I have not looked up the precedents.

LICENSING BILL.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1:—

Amendment again proposed—

"In page 1, line 7, after the words 'ill-conducted' to insert the words 'or for not having provided suitable refreshment'."—Mr. Herbert Roberts.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. SOARES (Devonshire, Barnstaple) said he understood that the Solicitor-General desired to substitute the following words for those in the Amendment under the consideration of the Committee—

"(2) "If the justices of a licensing district refuse to renew an on-licence on the ground that the holder of the licence has persistently and unreasonably refused to supply suitable refreshment (other than intoxicating liquor) the justices shall be deemed to have refused the licence on the ground that the premises have been ill-conducted."

He could only say that he hoped that the hon. Member for West Denbighshire would not withdraw his Amendment in favour of that of the Government; the substitution would be entirely unsatisfactory, and would give one test as to the bona fides of the Government in proposing it. They said that they intended to give power to the justices to take away a licence. This was the important point. They said the licence could be taken away under certain conditions. What did the Home Secretary say upon the subject the previous night? He said that to take away a licence under such circumstances would be to place upon the licensee an absolutely intolerable penalty; but, if the Amendment were to be taken as a really working Amendment, this was what he now intended to do. The fact of the matter was he knew perfectly well that the introduction of the word "persistently" made all the difference, because they would never be able to get evidence and prove it. By refusing the original Amendment they would be decidedly crippling the power of the magistrates. The magistrates now had power to refuse a licence in the event of reasonable refreshment not being supplied and he admitted that they had identically the same power under the Bill providing compensation were paid; but what would be the position if the compensation fund were exhausted, as it easily might be? There were many districts in the country in which there were a very large number of licences indeed and in which it was necessary to make a very large reduction at the earliest date. Under the Bill it was possible that the annual levy would be capitalised and a good many of these houses done away with. What would be the position of the licences that remained after they had exhausted their compensation fund? They would be in the position of the 1869 beerhouses. They could not be taken away except under the conditions of Clause 1 and under the condition which the Solicitor-General had put down in his Amendment. The Amendment was a most important one, because they had to consider whether they were going to give 1869 terms to a large number of licences in the country. He sincerely trusted the hon. Member would persist in his Amendment; if he did, he for one should certainly vote for it.

MR. LOUGH (Islington, W.) said the Committee seemed to be agreed as to the desirability of carrying some Amendment on this point, and he would, therefore, confine his observations to the suggestion of the Solicitor-General. He hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman would improve his Amendment by withdrawing the word "persistently." That was the word to which they took most exception. The Government had put two very strong expressions in their Amendment "persistently" and "unreasonably." Surely the latter was quite enough. If the publican desired to prove that the refreshment was demanded at an unusual hour or that he had run out of the articles asked for, it could not be laid down that he had acted unreasonably. He was bound to say that in his opinion the Government had gone a good way to meet the Amendment proposed from that side of the House, and he hoped that they would go a step further and drop the word "persistently."

SIR ROBERT REID (Dumfries Burghs) was of opinion that the Solicitor-General's Amendment would afford a basis on which this point could be discussed, but it did not remove the difficulty he had. Personally he thought the word "persistently" was open to very serious objection. The Amendment before the Committee was only an illustration of a considerable number of other cases in which the effect of Clause 1 was not merely to safeguard licensees against having their property taken away, but to relax the disciplinary jurisdiction which had hitherto been exercised by the justices. If they took away the right to suppress licences without compensation, they must make it perfectly clear that the right to obtain compensation was limited to the cases in which it was wished that compensation should be given. If the Government insisted on the present wording of the clause, they must not merely say that the refusal to provide refreshment was misconduct, but they must say a great many more things. They must use such words as would enable that kind of pressure which in the public interest had always been exercised to continue to be exercised in the future.

MAJOR JAMESON (Clare, W.) declared that the aim of the supporters of the Amendment was already secured under the Innkeepers' Liability Act. He noticed that there were eighty-eight pages of the Amendments to the Bill, and he ventured to assert that anyone going through them could reduce the number of the Amendments which really required discussion to eight. He protested against the delay which was occasioned by the discussion of this Amendment and similar Amendments, the sole object of which was to wreck the Bill.

MR. SAMUEL EVANS (Glamorganshire, Mid.) said the hon. Member who last spoke evidently was not aware of the circumstances which led to Progress being reported on the preceding night. It was the debate which had then been going on for some hours which made it absolutely necessary for the Solicitor-General to bring in his Amendment. He thought the word "persistently" in the Solicitor-General's Amendment was very objectionable as fettering the discretion of the magistrates, and that Clause 8, which dealt with definitions, was the wrong place to introduce it. If it was inserted in Clause 8, they would be practically giving a definition of the word "ill-conducted," and limiting the discretion of the justices as to what was or was not misconduct. They must not be content with a partial definition; they must, if they mentioned one point, enumerate other actions which would amount to misconduct, otherwise there was a danger that the Courts of Law would consider themselves fettered in this matter. As the general feeling of the House of Commons was clearly in favour of this Amendment, he trusted that the Government would agree to deal with the point in the clause now under consideration.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.) appealed to the Committee to bring the discussion to an end. He thought everybody would admit that the pledge given by his right hon. and learned friend had been honestly met by the Amendment which he had put down to Clause 8. He did not believe that hon. Gentlemen opposite concurred with the criticisms of the hon. Member for Barnstaple when he attacked the bona fides of the Government; indeed, he did not think the hon. Member himself would seriously question the bona fides of his right hon. and learned friend. The hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down said that Clause 8 was not the place for the Amendment, and suggested that when a case came before the licensing magistrates or before quarter sessions some lawyer would be found to get up and say that the Government had intended in Clause 8 to give a complete and exhaustive definition of what constituted misconduct. Well, he put no limits to what might be urged by counsel in various cases; but no tribunal of any description, in reading Clause 8 as his right hon. and learned friend proposed to amend it, would for a moment suggest that the whole area of misconduct was exhausted by it, or was intended by the Government or the House to be exhausted by it.

SIR ROBERT REID said there was a rule in law that general words were very often limited by special words following after, and then the principle of ejusdem generis was applied.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR said he was not qualified to contend with the hon. and learned Gentleman upon matters which were purely legal; he admitted the premises, but wholly denied the conclusion. That any Court would suggest that this question of misconduct was fully explained, limited, and exhausted by a provision about soda water and bread, was a proposition which the hon. and learned Gentleman would hardly entertain. He did not believe the danger was a genuine one. The Government were clearly of the opinion that the Amendment would be better on Clause 8, and he hoped, therefore, the Committee would proceed to the next Amendment.

Sir EDWARD GREY (Northumberland, Berwick) thought nobody would dispute that the Solicitor-General had acted with perfect bona fides in putting down his Amendmemt to meet the particular Amendment that was under discussion yesterday. But in the course of that discussion it was discovered that a very serious point underlay this Amendment, of which the Amendment was only an illustration. What had given real life to the debate, and caused the intervention of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham and the hon. and learned Member for Stretford, was the fact that the clause was doing what it was understood the Bill was not intended to do. The first clause as it stood destroyed the elasticity of discretion which the magistrates had had hitherto. That elasticity could not be restored by giving a special bit of elasticity on a special subject in another clause. Such a proposal seemed to him not only inadequate, but positively dangerous. The first question which would arise would be, what was meant by misconduct? and he would ask the Committee to look at that from a common sense and not a lawyer's point of view. What they wanted was some elasticity of interpretation; they wanted the magistrates, in the matter of misconduct, to retain the elastic discretion they now possessed. The real difficulty which confronted them could only be dealt with on the first clause.

Mr. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) said he could not in the least follow the arguments of the hon. Baronet. Could they possibly find wider words than "ill-conducted." There was no kind of conduct which they did not cover. The hon. Baronet talked of the want of elasticity, but he defied him to ransack English and Scotch dictionaries and to find a larger and more elastic term than that. For his own part, he could not help thinking it was a great pity that the Government did not stand by these words, because he held that they left a most complete and most elastic discretion to the justices. The reasonable refusal of refreshment would not be ill-conduct, but unreasonable refusal was certainly covered by those words; and if a licensing justice chose to hold that the unreasonable refusal of refreshment was ill-conduct, he would have a right to refuse to renew the licence. Again, he did not think that Clause 8 was the proper place at which to insert such an Amendment in the Bill. He had not had time to carefully consider the Amendment of the Solicitor-General, but he must say he thought it was open to the serious objection that it imposed far too heavy a penalty for what, after all, might be a very small offence. Still he feared that a lower penalty could not be imposed in that Bill. It was a misfortune that an inappropriate penalty should be introduced. He would suggest that if hon. Gentlemen opposite wanted to leave the licensing justices in full enjoyment of their full authority, the words "ill-conduct" would suffice to cover any case. If hon. Gentlemen would take his advice—and he did not suppose they would on either side—both the hon. Member for West Denbighshire and the Solicitor-General would withdraw their Amendments.

Mr. BROADHURST (Leicester) feared that the Committee were getting away from the main point. The one object they had in view in bringing forward that Amendment was to ensure that there were adequate opportunities of securing at wayside inns refreshments other than intoxicating drinks. They wanted to have it provided that innkeepers should be bound by law, under a penalty, to provide coffee, tea, and other light refreshments. Why could not the Government agree to that? It would be equally good for the motorist as the cyclist. Why should not the Prime Minister when out motoring be enabled to get a cup of tea at a wayside inn? What was necessary was greater freedom of choice in the matter of refreshments when travelling along the King's highway. He was prepared to admit that the Solicitor-General had more than fulfilled his pledge of the preceding night. He had not merely considered the matter as he promised to do, but he had placed on the Paper an Amendment. Now, he asked, would the hon. and learned Gentleman and the Prime Minister agree to delete the word "persistently"? The keeping of that word in would destroy the value of the Amendment. Supposing a man travelling with his wife, his mother, or his sweetheart, was refused a cup of tea, how would it satisfy his thirst to be told that if the innkeeper refused it on two or three more occasions he would lose his licence. He would not be satisfied, but, on the other hand, he might suffer harm by being compelled to take drinks for which he had no liking. Why not agree to cut out the word "persistently"? The Solicitor-General, having got some distance on the road to reason and justice in this matter, should complete his journey by removing the obstacle presented by that word.

Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon Boroughs) said he did not quite agree with the hon. Member for King's Lynn. He thought it was desirable that the Solicitor-General should put on the Paper the words he would move to add to Clause 8. He was not dissatisfied with the words save in regard to "persistently." There were some other matters which would have to be dealt with later on, but when he remembered what happened in connection with promises made during the progress of the Education Bill, he was afraid that the "later on" might not arrive. He thought the Solicitor-General wanted to meet their views, and as he could do it without in the slightest degree imperilling the Bill or the power of the magistrates, he would ask why the Scotch precedent should not be followed, and the words "without prejudice to other powers" be inserted. He thought words of that kind ought to be introduced so as not to exclude the power of the magistrates in regard to other misconduct. He did not agree with his learned friend that it would exclude cases of drunkenness on the premises, but to prevent the possibility of any misinterpretation why not give the magistrates power to make bylaws on this subject. It seemed to him that the Scotch precedent was an excellent one. It gave the magistrates power to make by-laws in regard to the supply of provisions. They had a list of the public-houses in their district before them, and they would say that it was unfair to ask that certain public-houses should supply all kinds of refreshments, taking into consideration the fact that there would be no demand for them. In other cases the licensees would be called upon to provide reasonable refreshment. That would have the advantage of keeping the control of the magistrates over the public-houses. It was important not merely in regard to refreshments, for the publicans would know that if they did not conduct themselves in such a way as to commend themselves to the approval of the Licensing Bench, the Bench would, in that way, be able to bring pressure on them. He had not seen magistrates go out of their way to exercise unfair pressure on the occupiers of public-houses. Quite the reverse. It was really important if they were to have these houses properly conducted that the magistrates should have that power. The Scotch law gave the power to the magistrates to select public-houses and to give them a schedule of the kind of refreshments they ought to provide. That was what they wanted inserted in this Bill.

*Mr. DISRAELI (Cheshire, Altrincham) said that all on that side of the House were not unanimous in agreeing with the Amendment of which the Solicitor-General had given notice. There was a strong opinion that this question was altogether outside the scope of the Bill, the object of which was to reduce the number of licensed houses and to give compensation for that reduction. If they put an obligation of this stringent character upon publicans, it would have the effect of making their lot harder than it was at the present time. The publican's calling was a very difficult one, and he protested against the present proposal having even the sentimental sanction of the Government.

Mr. WHITTAKER (Yorkshire, W.R., Spen Valley) said he agreed to some extent with the hon. Member who had just spoken that it was an extraordinary thing that they were discussing refreshments, such as tea and coffee, on the clause of the Bill dealing with compensation. He thought that arose from the way in which the clause had been drafted. The clause did not state what were the cases in which compensation ought to be given; on the other hand it stated the cases in which the magistrates could refuse the renewal of licences. In that case, it was necessary to give all the cases in which a licence could be refused other than on the ground that the licence was not required. They understood that compensation was to be given on the ground that a licence was not required. They were satisfied that as the Bill now stood compensation would be given for the refusal of licences on other grounds than that, and if that were to be guarded against they must have all kinds of protection to preserve the power of the justices in other cases that would come within the limit of the words "ill-conducted." There was unsatisfactory management which could scarcely be called ill-conduct. The failure to supply refreshments was not a case of ill-conduct. There were other cases in which they ought to have the power to refuse to renew a licence and not to give any compensation. He thought the Government could do better by defining positively those cases in which compensation should be given and using some such words as "compensation should be given when a licence was refused solely on the ground that it was not required in the neighbourhood." The ingenuity of the Government would enable them to draft words that would fulfil that object. Failing that, there was a number of Amendments on the Paper which they were bound to discuss. The proper way out of the difficulty, he ventured to submit, was to make it clear that compensation was to be confined to cases where the refusal to renew a licence was on the ground that the licences were in excess of the number required in the neighbourhood.

Mr. Disraeli

Mr. WHITLEY (Halifax) said he would make an appeal to the Prime Minister on this matter. At Question time the right hon. Gentleman said that the progress of the Finance Bill might be promoted if the Committee would get on with this Bill. He would point out that if the right hon. Gentleman would accept the Amendment now before the Committee he would save the discussion of two pages of Amendments. He asked the Prime Minister simply to carry out the statement which was made on the First Reading of the Bill. It was stated then that the whole object of the Bill was to provide compensation when renewal of licences was refused solely on the ground that the public-houses in the neighbourhood were in excess of the number required. If the right hon. Gentleman would carry out that promise which was made by the Home Secretary he would greatly facilitate the work of the Committee in dealing with the first clause. It could not be said that there was any danger of the magistrates refusing licences or inflicting too great penalties for small offences, such as refusing refreshments, because their action was always subject to appeal to quarter sessions. There had never been a single case where a licence had been removed for one refusal to supply reasonable refreshments. He thought that was a matter which the local magistrates should be left to deal with. One of the most serious points in the whole Bill was the method of proceeding by exclusion instead of inclusion. It took away the power of the magistrates to bring pressure to bear in the case of ill-conduct on the part of the licensee. If the procedure suggested by the hon. Member for the Spen Valley Division and the hon. Member for Leeds were adopted they would get over the whole of the difficulty.

Mr. AUSTIN TAYLOR (Liverpool, E. Toxteth) said the Amendment only assumed importance because it raised the general question as to how far the words used in the first clause would limit the absolute discretion of the justices. He regretted the attempt made in the Amendment to further define what was already sufficiently defined in the first clause, and he equally regretted the Amendment of which the Solicitor-General had given notice. He wished to give the Prime Minister a concrete instance of those minor matters which could not be called statutory offences, but had been made the subject of reform in Liverpool and other large centres. He would instance the case of what was called the "long pull" at Liverpool. There it was the practice at certain licensed houses to give a quantity of drink beyond that which was ordered.

*The CHAIRMAN said he thought the hon. Member was discussing the subject of some future Amendment.

Mr. AUSTIN TAYLOR said that he was trying to give an illustration of the kind of pressure which magistrates had been able to bring on the trade and to which the trade had loyally responded.

*The CHAIRMAN said he thought that subject would be relevant to a subsequent Amendment dealing with "undesirable practices."

Mr. AUSTIN TAYLOR said he would not give additional illustrations, but would content himself with emphasising the need for further consideration by the Government of the exact wording of the first clause. No doubt the absolute discretion of the magistrates must be modified if the principle of compensation were conceded; but there was no need to go so far as to weaken their legitimate control over the trade.

*Mr. JOSEPH WALTON (Yorkshire, W.R., Barnsley) said that it was of the highest degree of importance that the obligation resting on innkeepers to provide a supply of food as well as liquor to travellers should not be weakened; and it appeared to him that the Amendment put down by the Solicitor-General weakened the present authority of the licensing authorities in that respect. It was widely recognised that there was great laxity on the part of innkeepers in the fulfilment of this particular obligation of supplying food as well as intoxicating liquors. A few days ago he took a lovely country walk, and, having gone a reasonable distance, he thought he was sure to pass an hotel where he could get a comfortable luncheon. He came to one where there was a large notice-board outside, saying that luncheons were provided on the shortest notice; teas always ready; and pleasure parties catered for. He went in, and asked if he could get luncheon. The bar was full of people drinking, and the waiter said, "We have nothing in." He said, "Cannot you give me a bit of bread and cheese?" "No," was the answer, "we have nothing, but if you cross the river, and go a little bit further on, you will find a hotel, and perhaps you might get something to eat there." He crossed the river; and reached that other hotel. In the politest manner possible he asked the lady in charge whether he could have some luncheon. She said, "Unfortunately, we have not anything in." He happened to see through an open door some people having a meal, and he said, "Cannot you give me a little of what these are having?" And the reply was, "We have only enough for ourselves." Thereupon he said, "You call this an hotel! Surely you can supply me with some sort of food, however light it may be!" Then the landlord came upon the scene, and said, "We are not in the habit of being spoken to like that. I am quite able to do without custom such as yours." That was his morning's experience within a few miles of the great University centre of Oxford. If he were in the position of the right hon. Member for Oxford University he should feel it his duty to have a representation made in regard to such cases as that at the next brewsters sessions. What was wanted was that the public rights should be protected in connection with this Bill, and that travellers, in a reasonable way, should be able to get food as well as intoxicating liquors in every inn in the land. Everybody recognised that intoxicating liquors taken without food had a much greater effect than they had if taken with food, and, therefore, in all seriousness, he contended that the whole influence of the House should be directed to see that to a greater extent than at present food should be taken with intoxicating liquors; but that did not weaken the strength of his contention, that what was needed in connection with any reform of the licensing laws was that the authority of the licensing justices in regard to this most important matter should be strengthened by this Bill and not weakened. Therefore he supported the Amendment.

COLONEL PILKINGTON (Lancashire, Newton) said that the powers of the licensing justices in various parts of the country were regulated by a number of practically unprinted by-laws on which they acted. The local magistrates had all a slightly different procedure. He did not know whether, under this Bill, power might be given to the local authorities to make by-laws in regard to procedure in such cases, which by-laws should be confirmed by the Home Office or the quarter sessions. That would be a great advantage as a large number of the Amendments on the Paper could be regulated by these by-laws, which would show where the power of the local magistrates should stop and where the higher powers began.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Sir Alexander Acland-Hood and Mr. Ailwyn Fellowes.

MR. J. H. LEWIS (Flint Boroughs) said he wished to move to add after "ill-conducted," "or are remote from or difficult of police supervision." The question of police supervision came up before the Royal Commission; and a considerable amount of interesting evidence was given on it. He was quite content to found himself on the Reports of that Commission. The Majority Report, which was signed by eight members of the licensed trade, said that strict supervision of licensed houses should be maintained; and the Minority Report stated that it was difficult to over-rate the importance of strict supervision. Evidence was given showing that in country districts there were houses which could not be approached by a policeman without his being seen for a distance of three miles. What effective police supervision could be exercised in a case of that kind? The Chief Constable of Plymouth stated that there were public-houses in that town where the upper rooms were let to several tenants. In one house there were twenty-one persons. He added that the police could have no effective supervision over them. A clergyman from Devonport also gave evidence. They were told that the clergy were not to have any say in this Bill; but the duties of a clergyman led him into the lowest districts in the great towns; and the clergy had special opportunities of knowing the state of affairs. That witness said that families lodged in the smaller public-houses; that they were mostly drunken families; and that if they were not drunken when they came they very quickly became drunken. This class of house constituted one of the great evils with which magistrates had to deal in connection with the licensed trade, and in some parts of the country they had dealt with it very effectively. In Liverpool, for instance, the magistrates called upon the licensed victuallers to close a large number of back and side entrances, which made the houses difficult of police supervision. The licence-holders did not see their way to comply with the request, whereupon the magistrates intimated that the record of every house would be carefully examined, and the result was that at the next licensing sessions undertakings were given that the back and side entrances complained of should be closed. As a consequence, police supervision had become infinitely more effective, and he believed this course of action was one of the causes of the astounding decrease in the convictions for drunkenness in Liverpool, the number having dropped from 16,000 to 4,000 per annum. That was not merely a decrease on paper. Committees appointed by municipalities all over the kingdom had borne testimony to its reality, and responsible persons well acquainted with Liverpool declared it to be an infinitely more sober city. This power of enforcing effective police supervision would practically cease to exist under the Bill as it stood. It had been urged that the loss of licence would be too heavy a penalty for disobedience to such an order, but there was no likelihood of the magistrates acting harshly in the matter, past experience having shown that they never adopted strong measures unless an overwhelming case had been made out against a particular house. It would be absolutely impossible for a county licensing committee to inspect particular premises as the local justices had done for the purpose of ascertaining whether they could be effectively supervised, and he submitted that it was far better that the power should remain in the hands of the local justices as at present. Respectable publicans would not be injured in the least degree by this Amendment; it would affect only those who were not willing to comply with the reasonable requests of the magistrates. He begged to move.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 1, line 7, after the words 'ill-conducted' to insert the words 'or are remote from or difficult of police supervision.'"—(Mr. J. H. Lewis.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. BRIGG (Yorkshire, W.R., Keighley) said he could not help thinking that the Government had made a slip in leaving out of the Bill the words of this Amendment. One of the first things that a Licensing Bench asked the police when a licence was applied for was whether the house was suitably situated and constructed for effective police supervision. For thirty years he had had a good deal to do with the blocking up of backdoors and side entrances. There were only two grounds in the Bill on which licences might be refused, but he was informed there were no fewer than twenty-four different grounds on which licences had been endorsed. In all well-regulated districts the principle of the Amendment had been acted upon already, and it would be a very great deprivation of power if it were left out of the Bill. He was very strongly of opinion that the Amendment should be introduced in some form or other, and if the right hon. Gentleman was not prepared to accept it as it stood, he hoped he would be able to give a promise to deal with the matter with the other items which were now being taken out of the hands of the licensing magistrates.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. AKERS-DOUGLAS, Kent, St. Augustine's) said the hon. Member for Flint Boroughs had given very good reasons, not for the acceptance of the Amendment, but for the abolition of some of the houses which were difficult of police supervision. But though he agreed with much the hon. Member had said with reference to the evil complained of, he could not agree, on the ground either of equity or of efficiency, with the method by which he proposed to deal with it. He would have thought these houses were just those in respect of which compensation ought to be paid. They were presumably in the same place as when the licence was granted, and it was through no misconduct on the part of the licensee that their removal was now desired; therefore, if the licence was to be taken away, he thought there was a clear title to compensation. As to efficiency, the licensing justices would have a much freer hand in dealing with these houses if they knew they could award compensation. Judging from the speeches that had been made by experienced chairmen of quarter sessions, he was convinced that they would exercise their powers much more drastically if they felt that by so doing they would not be inflicting any individual hardship. He desired to see these houses reduced, and he was certain that object would be largely secured under the provisions of the Bill with regard to compensation. The hon. Member had also stated that the quarter sessions would be unable to deal with these houses so efficiently as the old brewster sessions. But with regard to ill-conducted houses, the brewster sessions would have all the power they had hitherto possessed. With regard to the action of quarter sessions, they would have to act upon the report of the local justices. At the present moment, in any of these cases in which brewster sessions acted, an appeal lay to quarter sessions. He was very sorry he could not accept this Amendment.

MR. WHITTAKER said that the Home Secretary's argument seemed to be based upon the idea that the only houses the licences of which would be refused would be those which were well managed and against which there was no complaint, and that the licence would be taken away solely because they were remote and difficult of police supervision. He could not imagine that any bench of magistrates would withhold the licences of houses on those grounds. Ill-conducted houses remote from police supervision were a most unsatisfactory class of houses, and should not be entitled to compensation on refusal of renewal of licences. The Bill, however, provided that compensation should be given in those cases. In the case of a house that had been mentioned the road could be seen for three miles, and the publican might be up to all sorts of tricks with impunity when he could have such long notice of the visits of the police. It was well known that this sort of thing was going on, but sufficient evidence could not be obtained owing to the difficulty of supervision. Now the justices could refuse the renewal of a licence on the ground that it was difficult of police supervision, but they would not refuse it if it was a house with a good reputation. Was it suggested that a magistrate would, in cold blood so to speak, refuse the licence of a well-managed house because it was some distance from police supervision? He was sure that magistrates would not refuse a licence to a house with a good character, no matter how remotely it was situated.

MR. SAMUEL EVANS said that there was one very important point raised by this Amendment, and it was the effect of non-compliance with the order of the justices in certain cases. This Amendment dealt with two classes of houses, one where the house was remote from police supervision, and the other where it was difficult of police supervision. Under the Act of 1902 a very salutary provision was inserted in Section 11 which gave the justices power to call for various alterations and plans of what they thought ought to be done in reference to the structure of the house. Sub-section 4 of that section provided that in the case of any application for the renewal of a licence the licensing justices might require a plan of the premises to be produced, and order such alterations to be made as they thought reasonably necessary for the proper conduct of the business in that part of the premises where intoxicating liquors were sold. No other order could be made in regard to those particular premises for five years, fines being provided for in case of non-compliance with the order. Licensing magistrates had adopted the practice of calling for the plans of the houses where they thought structural alterations were necessary. Supposing such an order were made and it was not complied with, would disobedience to any such order constitute ill-conduct of the house? Where there was misconduct in the management of licensed premises the justices in the Court below could refuse the licence, and no compensation would be payable. He desired to know the intention of the Government in regard to this point. Would licensed premises be regarded as ill-conducted if the licence-holder declined to obey the order of the justices for structural alteration? He thought it was doubtful whether that would constitute misconduct. In such cases of wilful disobedience the licence-holder ought to be placed in this position, that when he asked for a renewal the magistrates should have the right of saying, "No; you have disobeyed our order, and therefore we will refuse to renew your licence." In a case of that kind the holder ought not to be entitled to compensation. If compensation were to be given at all, it should be in a congested area, and where there was no particular reason why the licence of a house should be taken away, except that the justices wished to reduce the number. If a house were so remote that it was not necessary at all, and served no public purpose, the licence-holder was not entitled to compensation; and the justices in the Court below should be able to refuse renewal without reference to the quarter sessions. Everything turned upon that. He hoped the Solicitor-General would state whether, in his view, this case constituted a disqualification.

MR. DISRAELI reminded the hon. Member opposite that, in the case of the tin mine he had mentioned, if the owner had paid into an insurance fund he would undoubtedly have got compensation. He strongly supported the argument of his right hon. friend the Home Secretary. This Bill would deal with the cases of remote public-houses, and those hon. Members who had had a great deal to do with county work knew that it was an exceedingly difficult thing for the county police force to supervise all these remote public-houses. These remote public-houses might be divided into two classes, badly-conducted and well-conducted. If a house was badly-conducted, it would go under by the action of the magistrates; if it was well-conducted this Bill would remove the difficulty.

MR. MCKENNA (Monmouthshire, N.) said he was sure that members of the Government would drop a tear to think that the "Sharpe v. Wakefield" decision would be the law no longer. If this Amendment were not accepted that decision would no longer stand. As the law now stood, the Court of quarter sessions, after hearing the evidence, could refuse to renew on the ground of the remoteness of the premises from police supervision; that remoteness was under the existing law sufficient ground for non-renewal of the licence. If this Amendment was not accepted they would depart from that decision. The objection to this Amendment put forward by the Home Secretary was that the true ground for compensation under this Bill was where a licence was taken away owing to no fault of the holder. If that was so, why did he not say so in the Bill? If the Committee understood that the intention of the Government was to compensate only the holders of licences who were deprived of their licences through no fault of their own, that would be, on the face of it, an equitable reason, assuming that the grounds adopted by the Government were accepted. If the Home Secretary would act upon the statements made by himself, the Prime Minister, and the Solicitor-General, and formulate them in clear and intelligible words, he would get through with this measure very much more quickly. It was because the Committee had to protect the public rights against the brewers' claims that hon. Members were compelled to introduce Amendment after Amendment in order that the justices or other authorities should not be unduly limited in the exercise of their discretion.

THE SOLICITOR-GENERAL (Sir EDWARD CARSON, Dublin University), said he was greatly afraid that if they adopted the suggestion of the hon. Member who had just sat down, they would bring upon themselves a great many more Amendments than they had at the present moment. He did not for a moment suppose that the trade would object to a sweeping clause of that kind — that compensation was to be paid in every case where a licence was withdrawn through no fault of the holder. That would be a very easy method of legislation, but it would take up too much time to state the numerous objections which would be raised to any such sweeping words as those suggested. His right hon. and learned friend opposite had put to him a Question as to what would happen if the magistrates made a certain order for the improvement of premises and the order was disobeyed. He did not think that question really arose on the question of misconduct at all. What it did arise upon was the question of structural deficiency of the premises. These words had been left as wide as possible. The words were "structurally deficient or unsuitable," and what really would happen would be this. He would like the Committee to see how well the law gave power to the magistrates in these cases, and that none of the matters would happen which the mover of the Amendment seemed to anticipate from the passing of the Bill. What were the powers of the magistrates in relation to this matter—in the first place, as the hon. Member had pointed out, they had power under the Act of 1892 to impose a penalty of twenty shillings a day for every day the alteration remained unexecuted after a specified time. He thought that very few of the men they were dealing with would last long if they went on incurring a penalty of twenty shillings a day. It would put an end to the question of compensation, and it would put an end to the public-house in a very summary way. Although this matter was dealt with in a subsequent part of the Bill, still it was germane to the question now before the Committee. If premises were structurally deficient or unsuitable after the magistrates had made an order for alterations, the magistrates, when the man came before them, would be able to say, "You have not obeyed our order. Your premises are structurally deficient, or structurally unsuitable. We have given you a chance, and we will now take away your licence on that ground." If they took it away there was an appeal but no compensation would be paid in such cases. The mover of the Amendment said the local magistrates were much better judges of the question of the structural alterations that might be necessary than quarter sessions. But the position would be exactly the same after the Bill was passed as it was now.

In regard to the other matter raised by the Amendment, were they going, because premises were "remote from or difficult of police supervision," to deprive the licence-holder of compensation? Supposing a man got a licence at a time, say, when there was a police barrack near it, and that it was thought more convenient to have the barrack elsewhere, or that it was decided that the police force should be less than it was before, and if the licence-holder had done nothing to bring himself within the provisions of the Bill which would deprive him of compensation, surely it was not unfair to say that if he subscribed to the insurance fund he ought to get compensation. Might he say to the hon. Member that this very Amendment seemed to him to be an illustration of how necessary it was to have some such scheme as this. The hon. Member had described to the Committee numbers of these houses which he said it was practically impossible to supervise from their situation or otherwise, and, if that was so, how did it come that with absolute discretion vested in the magistrates these houses had continued to exist? Simply and solely because the magistrates had not felt that they should take away these licences when there was no fault on the part of the licensees. If the house was very remote and not a public convenience the compensation would be very small. He submitted, therefore, that this was not a reasonable Amendment.

Question put.

Sir Alexander Acland-Hood and Mr. Ailwyn Fellowes.

MR. HERBERT ROBERTS (Denbighshire, W.) said that the Amendment standing in his name raised a point of considerable importance. It was—

> "In page 1, line 7, leave out 'or are,' and insert 'or that undesirable practices or methods of trading having been carried on in or in connection therewith or that the premises are insanitary or.'"

The effect of Clause 1 as it now stood was to reduce the discretion of the local licensing justices to the level of their discretion in regard to the ante-1869 beer licences. The best way for him to explain the reasons for moving this Amendment was to mention three or four "undesirable practices" as to which there could be no doubt, and to ask the Solicitor-General whether the phrase in the Bill "ill-conducted" would cover these practices and give the licensing justices the power to refuse a licence without compensation. First of all, there was defective management as distinguished from ill-conduct. Then there was the irregular opening of licensed premises. It might be easily argued that these points were not covered by the phrase "ill-conducted." Next, there was offering attractions to induce customers to patronise a public-house, such as giving the "long pull," giving free drinks at Christmas, etc. These were the kind of "undesirable practices" which the licensing justices had, during the last few years, considered grounds on which they were permitted to refuse licences. The Royal Commission had brought before them a great deal of evidence as to the existence of these undesirable practices, especially in regard to music and dancing, which necessarily led to undesirable consequences, and the "long pull," which was still resorted to to a very large extent all over the country. It was of the utmost consequence that every effort should be made to widen, as far as possible, the discretion of the licensing justices, and the object of his Amendment was to secure that.

"In page 1, line 7, to leave out the word 'are,' and insert the words 'that undesirable practices or methods of trading have been carried on in or in connection therewith or that the premises are insanitary or.'"—(Mr. Herbert Roberts.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'are' stand part of the clause."

MR. AUSTIN TAYLOR said that in the absence of any satisfactory explanation from his right hon. friend the Solicitor-General, he should feel obliged to support the Amendment. The real position was that they were attempting to define the grounds on which magistrates could refuse licences without compensation. At present the magistrates had absolute discretion, always provided it was judicially exercised. It was now proposed to limit the grounds on which they could refuse a licence without compensation. The first ground was that the licensed premises was ill-conducted; but there were other practices which, although not statutory offences, did not make for the good conduct of a public-house. In Liverpool and other large centres the licensing magistrates, with the assistance of the trade—and the trade was perfectly willing to co-operate—had been able to bring about certain reforms. There was the case of the "long pull." He had no practical experience of it himself; but he believed it meant giving extra measure in order to unduly stimulate the drinking propensity, especially in the case of women. The magistrates were able to put a stop to that practice. The sale of drink to children was now a statutory offence; but before it was, the magistrates in certain centres exercised pressure and put a stop to it. He wanted to know from the Solicitor-General whether the magistrates would, in future, be in a weaker or in a similar position as the result of this clause. The declared intention of the Government was to compensate those who lost their licences through no fault of their own; but they ought to know if, in carrying out that object, the disciplinary power of the magistrates over the trade would be weakened. He hoped that a satisfactory explanation would be given, as many Unionists, in the House and out of it, felt very strongly on the matter.

MR. WHITLEY said that the real question was that the power which the magistrates at present exercised for the better conduct of public-houses would be taken away from them. Let the Committee consider such practices as giving sweets to children, or giving away free drinks. At present the magistrates could say that unless such practices were stopped they would consider very carefully the renewal of the licence. That power was now to be taken away; and the licence-holder could snap his fingers at the magistrates. He was sorry that no explanation was given as to why the clause was not drafted the other way round. Many Unionist Members had informed him that, in their opinion, the first clause should provide that where a licence was not renewed on the ground that there were too many licences in the neighbourhood compensation should be given. He could not understand why the Government made no response to that suggestion. He had heard that the Bill was originally drafted in that way, but that it was altered. It was due to the Committee that a clear reason for the change should be given. The argument of the Home Secretary when he introduced the Bill was that it would be unfair to pick out a particular house and suppress it without compensation, although it might be no worse than the other houses in the locality. That, as far as it went, was a sound argument if they went in for compensation at all; but the Government ought to consider whether the clause should not be restored to its original form.

Sir JOHN GORST (Cambridge University) said that they were told by the Government that there was no intention of interfering with the discretionary power of the magistrates. The only objection he saw to the Amendment was that it was unnecessary, as its purport was included in the phraseology of the Bill. But, on that point, the Committee ought to have the assurance of the Solicitor-General. He himself thought that the word "ill-conduct" embraced all the practices which had been described. If the Solicitor-General would assure the Committee that that was so, then, he thought, the hon. Gentleman might withdraw his Amendment. He was speaking on the assumption that the Government did not mean by the phraseology of the Bill to limit, in any way, the discretionary power now possessed by the magistrates.

Sir ROBERT REID said he agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Cambridge University. The matter was of extreme importance. The object of the Amendment was to enable the magistrates to exercise pressure. There were only two ways of putting on pressure. One was by the infliction of penalties, which they were precluded from proposing because it would be outside the scope of the Bill; and the other was the method which at present existed, namely, the right of the magistrates to refuse a licence. They had two categories, one the refusal of a licence with compensation, the other the refusal of a licence for an offence without compensation. The second category disinclined justices to act, on the ground that it would be harsh treatment to deprive a man of his licence without compensation. Accordingly, there was no remedy left in connection with the practices which they wished to discontinue except the extreme remedy of forfeiting the licence. That was the position. The Amendment did not propose anything unfair or arbitrary. The existing powers with regard to discontinuance of licences were to be divided between quarter sessions and the licensing justices. But if there was no intention of interfering with the disciplinary jurisdiction of the local magistrates, why should not this matter be left with the licensing justices with an appeal to quarter sessions? The powers of pressure with respect not of statutory offences, but of such matters as child service, would be entirely taken away from the magistrates by the peculiar construction of the Bill. With regard to the particular Amendment before the Committee, "undesirable practices" might cover matters which would not strictly come within the term "ill-conducted." As to "undesirable methods of trading," if some such words were not inserted the magistrates would certainly lose their power of insisting upon proper conditions with regard to the tenure of the house, the tying of a house, or matters of that kind. Whatever else was done, the Committee ought to reserve to the magistrates the power of pressure which they at present possessed. subject to appeal to quarter sessions.

Sir EDWARD CARSON submitted that the way in which the Bill had been drafted would effectively prevent magistrates unjustifiably placing public-houses in the class to which compensation would be paid. The Bill stated in black and white certain grounds in regard to which if a licence was refused no compensation would be forthcoming, therefore the magistrates would have to place those cases in the class to which compensation would not be paid.

Sir ROBERT REID: The Bill does not say that the magistrates "must"; they can do as they like, and that makes all the difference.

Sir EDWARD CARSON: Not at all.

Sir ROBERT REID: Surely the Solicitor-General does not maintain that wherever there is ill-conduct, structural deficiency, or question concerning the character or fitness of the proposed licence-holder, the magistrates are bound to take away the licence ?

SIR EDWARD CARSON said that what he meant was that if the magistrates came to the conclusion that a licence ought to be taken away on any of the three specified grounds, the Bill was so framed as to amount to a direction to the magistrates to give no compensation. It left no loophole for magistrates to take the course feared by the hon. and learned Member. He agreed that the disciplinary powers of the magistrates ought not to be taken away, and he denied that they were being taken away by the Bill. There could hardly be a wider term than "ill-conduct," and it was for the magistrates to decide what came within the term. Whether "lax management" was of a sufficiently serious kind to be called "ill-conducted" and the other matters referred to by the hon. and learned Member, would all be left to the magistrates to determine. At present if a complaint of lax management was made, the magistrates would probably warn the licence-holder that unless matters improved they would take serious notice of the complaint at the next licensing sessions, and there was nothing whatever in the Bill to prevent a similar course being followed in the future. Whether the offering of attraction—the provision of music, and so forth—came within the term "ill-conduct" would all be for the magistrates to determine.

MR. AUSTIN TAYLOR: Are we to understand that there would be no appeal from the magistrates' construction of "ill-conduct" ?

SIR EDWARD CARSON: There would be an appeal to quarter sessions.

MR. AUSTIN TAYLOR: And beyond that ?

SIR EDWARD CARSON: Certainly not.

MR. SAMUEL EVANS: Except by special case, I suppose ?

SIR EDWARD CARSON: There might be that, no doubt.

SIR ROBERT REID: They would not be bound to give their reasons.

SIR EDWARD CARSON: Nor would they for misconduct. They would say "We refuse the licence on the ground that the premises have been ill-conducted, and they would not be bound to give any reasons. As a matter of fact, the disciplinary power of pressure would be much greater than at present because if a licence-holder failed to come up to the view of the magistrates he would run the risk of losing the whole of the compensation to which he had contributed. Therefore, the power, instead of being weakened, would be greatly strengthened.

*MR. LAWSON WALTON (Leeds, S.) said he wished to know if the words in the clause "ill-conducted" meant that the premises had been ill-conducted in the opinion of the magistrates. This ought to be made clear by a definition clause. As the section was drawn, "ill-conducted" was purely in relation to the premises, and had no bearing whatever in regard to the trade. The Solicitor-General knew very well the class of offence he had in his mind—where the licensed premises had been used as a resort for betting men or harbouring persons of ill-fame, and instead of being used for refreshment by the public had, by the permission of the owner, been "ill-conducted" in ways which conflicted with good order and due observance of the law. He was sure that the Solicitor-General would not say it was an extravagant suggestion. Obviously certain methods of trading, which all regarded as objectionable, would have nothing to do with "ill-conduct," as, for instance, the "long pull," which was an objectionable method of trading. It might also include the employment of certain persons in the service of a licensed person, not only children, but also the employment of barmaids. In Glasgow they regarded the employment of barmaids as highly objectionable. Proper regulation of the staff, the prohibition of objectionable methods of trading by offering inducements to drinking, and unfair competition—none of these fell within the meaning of the expression "ill-conducted," confined as it was to the premises. Therefore, he wished to challenge the earnestness of the Solicitor-General by asking him to see that this very serious doubt was removed by placing in a definition clause the exposition of this section which he had just given. If the right hon. Gentleman would boil down into a phrase the speech he had just delivered the point of the Amendment would be met.

MR. CORBETT (Glasgow, Tradeston) said he felt quite sure that the Committee would accept the interpretation given by the Solicitor-General upon this point, and he hoped it would be carried out. The hon. Member for Liverpool had alluded to what had been done in that city in carrying out the regulations made by the magistrates, which had greatly improved the conduct of the trade there and had reduced drunkenness by one-third. At Liverpool the disciplinary powers of the magistrates over the ordinary public-houses were complete, and they had brought about a great improvement. But in regard to the ante-1869 beerhouses, the Liverpool magistrates complained that they could do nothing, because they had not the same wide discretion over these particular houses as they had over the conduct of other houses. He hoped that the Government would place words in Clause 1 which would give justices a discretionary power of determining what was "ill conduct," as mentioned in the clause. The proposal to do away with barmaids had been mentioned by the hon. Member for South Leeds. It was treated sometimes with a certain kind of scorn in quarters with no experience of the system of employing barmaids. The system had been done away with in many countries, and he ventured to think that if the time came in England when this occupation was done away with, as it had been in Glasgow, people would look back with wonder upon the time when such occupation was carried on by young women. Barmaids were in many instances kept at work from ninety to ninety-five hours per week, and a more dangerous and more injurious occupation it would be very difficult to imagine. It was a very great thing that the magistrates, in the exercise of their discretion in Glasgow, had been able to make a valuable experiment in this direction, and he hoped ultimately it would be followed in other parts of the country.

*MR. LAWRENCE (Liverpool, Abercromby) said that the disciplinary powers of the magistrates should be preserved was quite plain. He thought the clause as it stood seemed at first sight to be open to the criticisms passed upon it by the hon. and learned Member opposite. By the insertion of the word "conduct" later on, he thought the discretionary power of the magistrates would remain intact.

SIR EDWARD GREY said the Solicitor-General had endeavoured to soothe, and to some extent had soothed, the apprehension entertained with regard to the effect of this clause by giving a very wide interpretation to the words "ill-conducted." He wished to ask the Home Secretary if he would do something to make it quite clear what the Committee intended by inserting, somewhere, the words "in the opinion of the justices." If those words were inserted, they would at any rate strengthen the interpretation suggested by the Solicitor-General.

MAJOR JAMESON trusted that the Home Secretary would in no way alter this clause. The Committee ought not to forget that all these legal subtleties were not of the slightest use to the common or garden magistrate, and he was one of them. There was not a single crime in the calendar which this clause did not cover. If they kept adding these legal subtleties, it would take three sessions to get the Bill through. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would insist upon the clause standing intact.

MR. ELLIS GRIFFITH (Anglesey) said the difficulty felt on both sides of the House was one apparently which the Government was anxious to meet, and he thought words could be inserted which would meet their views. The difficulty arose from the fear that "ill-conducted" was too strong a term. He suggested that if the Home Secretary would introduce some word or words which would make the expression "ill-conducted" less rigid, such as "lax management" or "badly conducted," it would meet the wishes of Members on that side of the Committee.

SIR JOHN KENNAWAY (Devonshire, Honiton) said he had listened with very great satisfaction to the statement of the Solicitor-General; and, as both sides were in practical agreement on this matter, he thought they might ask the Home Secretary to undertake that words should be inserted which would carry out the assurance of the Solicitor-General.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE said he trusted the Home Secretary would respond to the appeal which had come not only from the Opposition side of the House but also from his own side, to do something to meet the case which had been placed before the Committee. He was afraid the words suggested by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Berwick, "in the opinion of the magistrates," did not make any substantial alteration in the meaning of the clause. The words "ill-conducted" were too strong to cover the various difficulties suggested by his hon. friend. Take such a case as had recently arisen in Liverpool of sailors' advance notes. That was a case in which it would not be "ill-conduct" or an offence against the law, but at the same time it was a practice that ought to be put an end to, and the magistrates ought to have the requisite power to do so. "Free drinks" was another case. The hon. member for Halifax had mentioned a case of serious assault outside a public-house which very nearly led to murder, That case was the result of a big fête which a publican had given, when there were free drinks to everybody. That, again, was a practice the magistrates should have power to put an end to. Surely the Home Secretary could give an undertaking to introduce words covering cases of this character, so that the magistrates would know the class of case they had to deal with without compensation.

*__MR. BOUSFIELD__ (Hackney, N.) said he wished, speaking as a magistrate, to say how much he appreciated the friendly language used with reference to the preservation of the disciplinary powers of the magistrates. He felt certain that it was a matter of the highest importance, and on the question of substance there was no difference between the two sides of the House. That the Government regarded this matter as one of the highest importance was shown by the fact that they had given what they considered a full catalogue. The question was whether that catalogue was wide enough to include all the cases which might arise. The Solicitor-General had expressed the opinion that the words "ill-conducted" would cover those cases contemplated by the present Amendment and a great many other things of the same sort. If the right hon. Gentleman were on the Bench he would give effect to that opinion, but his opinion now given would not be even quotable when a case came before the Court. It could in no way bind anybody, and therefore one must rely on one's own judgment as to the way this would be construed by the Judges before whom cases might come. He suggested for the consideration of the Solicitor-General the words "or any reasonable requirement of the magistrates is not complied with" as making it quite clear that the disciplinary powers of the magistrates were preserved.

MR. ATHERLEY-JONES (Durham, N.W.) said he was disposed to agree with the Solicitor-General that the words were at present sufficiently large to meet all the cases, but at the same time he was disposed, for the sake of greater security, to press upon him that it would be desirable to accept the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Berwick and add the words "in the opinion of the magistrates," which, he thought, would meet the whole case. As the clause at present stood, what would come before the Court would be misconduct, and what would come before the High Court of Justice was what was misconduct, and the interpretation there might differ widely from that of the magistrates. If, however, they put in the words "in the opinion of the magistrates," the High Court would be bound to say: "This is misconduct in the opinion of the magistrates"; and they would not be able to go behind that. He considered there could be no possible objection to the acceptance of these words.

SIR J. FERGUSSON (Manchester, N.E.) said it was proposed to introduce into the Bill a definition of the ordinary powers of the magistrates. The object of the Bill was to enable the number of public-houses to be reduced in the public interest, and to give compensation when that was done for reasons other than the misconduct of the licensee. He was anxious that the discretion of the magistrates in regard to discipline and the conditions of licences should not be impaired, but he considered it undesirable that Parliament should introduce catalogues which could not be complete, and which might open the door to many dangers.

Mr. ASQUITH (Fifeshire, E.) agreed with the right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken that it was dangerous to make definitions, conditions, and qualifications in the way proposed, but thought that was a criticism which he ought to apply to the authors of the Bill. The whole scheme of this first clause was to take the present unfettered discretion of the justices and reduce it to a mere shadow of its former self. He understood the object of the mover of the Amendment to be to reinstate, as far as was possible consistently with the object of the Bill, the justices in their discretion. He was inclined to share the opinion that under the term "ill-conducted" the practices referred to in the course of the debate might very likely be held not to be included. It was not safe, if the House really wanted matters of this kind to be taken into account by the justices, to let the Bill pass with this vague phrase. Matters of this kind ought to be dealt with in a rational and sensible way, and a course which would save a great deal of time would be if the Government consented to introduce words which would elucidate the interpretation of "ill-conducted." He would suggest that the clause should run "ill-conducted, or that the licensee has failed to comply with any reasonable requirement made by the justices." He thought that that would cover all cases of misconduct, and would enable the licensing justices to retain a large share of the beneficent power which they now possessed of controlling licences.

Mr. MIDDLEMORE (Birmingham, N.) said hon. Members on both sides of the House had listened with interest and sympathy to the explanation of the Solicitor-General; but the request now was that he should make clear what was not so clear. This was all they asked. It was evident to him, but there were legal luminaries in the House to whom it was certainly not clear and to whom it appeared susceptible of a construction other than that which the right hon. and learned Gentleman placed upon it. They asked him very respectfully and earnestly to introduce into the Bill phrases and alterations which would satisfy those who were pleased with his interpretation of the word "ill-conducted" but were not satisfied with the form in which it was expressed.

Mr. WHITTAKER said he did not like the phrase "ill-conducted." It seemed to him that better words would be "that the licensed premises and the trade thereof have been unsatisfactorily conducted."

Mr. EDWARDS (Radnor) said that there seemed to be a general feeling on both sides of the House that something should be done in the direction of the Amendment. The hon. and gallant Member for West Clare said that the Amendment should not be accepted because the magistrates would not be bothered with legal subtleties. Why, that was the very reason why the Committee should accept the words suggested in the Amendment. It was very necessary that such practices as were referred to in the Amendment should be stopped. In the Act of 1872, six or seven reasons were given for closing a public-house on account of malpractices, and since that time there had been an immensely increased competition in the business of licensed houses, and that competition led licensed holders to do things which ought not to be done in the way of enticing trade. It was to contend with that new state of things that the Amendment had been proposed.

Mr. SAMUEL EVANS urged that the best course would be for the Government to state in what cases compensation should be given. It was the duty of all hon. Members to offer assistance in carrying out the views expressed on both sides of the House, and he suggested the addition after "ill-conducted" of the words "or that any other requirement or condition which the justices may in their discretion make or impose has not been complied with or observed." He thought these words would carry out the wishes expressed on both sides of the House.

COLONEL PILKINGTON said he thought that the Bill would go through much more quickly if words were inserted preserving the power of the local justices, except in cases where a public-house was abolished because it was not required.

MR. MARKHAM (Nottinghamshire, Mansfield) said the House was in an extraordinary position. The Solicitor-General said the word "ill-conducted" was subject to one interpretation, whilst legal Gentlemen of the greatest ability on his own and the other side of the House thought it was capable of a different interpretation. Why did the Government treat the House with silence when there was absolute agreement on this point on both sides of the House? He did not know whether the Solicitor-General or the Home Secretary was in charge of the Bill because they went in and out of the House continually and did not hear the arguments. The Solicitor-General had been out of the House twice.

SIR EDWARD CARSON said that he had only been out of the House once, and that it was absolutely impossible for one who had other duties to discharge to remain the whole time in the House.

MR. MARKHAM, who rose again amid loud cries of "withdraw," said he would certainly withdraw if the Solicitor-General said he had only been out once. Proceeding, he said that the discussion had been confined very largely to legal Gentlemen. Some took one view and others another view as to the interpretation of the word "ill-conducted," and he thought a very simple arrangement, seeing that hon. Members on both sides of the House were in agreement, would be for the Government to accept some words to save all this discussion. The suggestion of the hon. Member for Berwick to insert the words "in the opinion of the magistrates" met entirely the view of hon. Members on that side of the House. If it were made clear that it was to be "ill-conducted" in the opinion of the magistrates, what clearer definition could they have. As legal gentlemen differed, some of whom might be Judges in time to come, why in the name of creation did the Government, if it wanted to facilitate the passing of the Bill, maintain an absolute silence in regard to the suggestions made.

MR. JOHN ELLIS (Nottinghamshire, Rushcliffe) said in order to meet the point he thought they were entitled to have the opinion of the Government upon it. They had had a most business-like discussion and there was almost a common agreement that some words should be introduced such as those suggested by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Devonshire, which would be agreeable in all quarters. They were drifting into the position in which the House found itself on the previous night and no time was being gained. He hoped the Solicitor-General would be able to give to the House some actual words which would carry out the evident sense of the House on the matter.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said he had really nothing to add to the statement of the Solicitor-General. Surely the case was quite plain. The Government were of opinion that a mans' licence might be taken away without compensation for misconduct; they were not of opinion that it ought to be taken away without compensation for something which was not misconduct. The word "misconduct" was a wide word. [Several MEMBERS: It is not the word used.] "Ill-conduct" was a wide word. It would have to be interpreted by the magistrates, with, of course, an appeal to quarter sessions; and he did not think the wording of the Bill in this particular could be improved. What some Members were tacitly driving at was that a man should be liable to be deprived of his licence for something which was not ill-conduct. [OPPOSITION cries of "No, no!"] Others, no doubt, would like to see the Government embark in an endless attempt to define. That might suit other objects which they had in view, but it certainly would not improve this Bill as a measure of licensing reform or help the magistrates to carry out their duty. If they did mean to increase the number of offences under the Licensing Acts it should be done by a separate Bill. He would now suggest that a decision should be taken on the matter.

Mr. ASQUITH said the right hon. Gentleman had spoken with great lucidity, and they now clearly understood that the Government offered a blank negative to all the suggestions offered, as much from their own side of the House as from the other, to meet a difficulty which, except the Prime Minister himself, no one had denied was a real one. Now the Prime Minister came in at the end of the debate and said that although the Bill contained a phrase which in all probability would not be held to cover certain practices, and although there was a general agreement that they were practices which ought to be covered, yet on behalf of the Government he refused to insert words to meet the wishes of the Committee. He would leave the situation there.

*Mr. BOUSFIELD said he did not think the Prime Minister quite appreciated the suggestions which had been made during the debate. He was quite sure that the Government did not intend to speak with two voices on the subject. The Solicitor-General had spoken quite sympathetically on behalf of the Government with reference to preserving the disciplinary powers which the magistrates at present had. The Prime Minister had put it to the Committee that the Amendment would mean very heavy penalties for slight offences. That was not the situation. At present the magistrates had power to impose reasonable requirements upon an applicant for renewal. They desired that that power should be preserved, and they understood from the Solicitor-General that the Government regarded that as a desirable object. He himself had suggested a form of words which would make it clear; and he ventured humbly to suggest that the Prime Minister had not quite appreciated the situation when he spoke. He did not desire to press the Government at that moment, but the matter was one which ought to have their serious attention. The last words of the Prime Minister might, he thought, lead to some misunderstanding as being apparently out of concord with what the Solicitor-General had previously said. They did not desire to penalise the licence-holder, but only to ensure that the magistrates would have power to impose reasonable requirements.

Sir JAMES JOICEY (Durham, Chester-le-Street) said he thought it was very unfortunate that the Prime Minister should have intervened without having heard the discussion. The Committee had practically agreed that words should be inserted to preserve the discretion of the magistrates, and he hoped that arrangement would not be upset.

Mr. MARKHAM said as the Prime Minister had only just come into the House and had not heard the discussion, he thought it would be well if they went through it again.

*The CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. Gentleman will not be entitled to repeat arguments.

Mr. MARKHAM said that he would not repeat arguments; but would refer to the obstruction of the Government which would prevent the Bill getting through the House. The Government would not take the view that any business man would take as to the meaning of the words under discussion. They were told, without going into the question of the employment of barmaids, which was debated at considerable length, that very considerable evils arose in many districts as the result of betting. Great evils resulted from betting, and he, therefore, should be prepared to vote for the Amendment.

Mr. J. F. HOPE (Sheffield, Brightside) said he thought the best course would be to let the words in the clause stand, and, if on further consideration it became apparent that the object sought for was not covered by them, the matter could be brought up again on the definition clause and words adopted which would satisfy the general sense of the House. It seemed to him a matter of some importance; but unless the Government could find words at once to satisfy the general sense of the Committee, it would be better, for the present, to stick to the words in the Bill.

SIR JOHN KENNAWAY said he hoped that the Government would introduce words which would give effect to the Solicitor-General's interpretation of the clause.

Question put.

Tellers for the Noes—Mr. Herbert Roberts and Mr. Emmott.

Mr. HEYWOOD JOHNSTONE (Sussex, Horsham), who had on the Paper an Amendment to leave out "or are structurally deficient or unsuitable," and to insert "or that the applicant has failed to comply with an order for structural alterations under Section 11, Sub-section 4, of The Licensing Act, 1902," said that as, in consequence of the decision just taken, he was unable to move the whole of his Amendment, he proposed merely to move to omit the words "structurally deficient or." Under the Licensing Act of 1902, when application was made for the renewal of a licence, the petty sessional Court might require the submission of plans, and direct certain structural alterations to be made, from which order there was an appeal to quarter sessions. That being the case, he submitted that the necessity for including structural defects as a ground for the refusal of a licence without compensation had practically disappeared. Although it would have been more satisfactory to have made the matter perfectly clear by the insertion of the words he originally proposed to move, he thought it would be sufficient, in view of existing legislation under which an order for structural alterations could be made, to allow the matter to take the course enacted by the Act of 1902. If a licence-holder had had no opportunity given him of remedying the structural defects, the reasonable discretion of the magistrates might very well be left as at present. He did not think that structural defects per se, where no order had been made for alterations, should be made a ground for refusal to renew. He begged to move.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the clause."

Sir ROBERT REID pointed out that the Solicitor-General had declared the intention of the Government to be not to diminish the disciplinary jurisdiction of the magistrates. At present, the magistrates could exercise that disciplinary jurisdiction in respect of structural defects. By the present Amendment the discretion of the magistrates would incontestably be diminished; therefore he submitted that its acceptance would be wholly inconsistent with the statement of the Solicitor-General.

Sir EDWARD CARSON said he laid special stress upon these words, which he considered were absolutely necessary in order to carry out the intention of the Government.

Question put, and agreed to.

*Mr. H. D. GREENE (Shrewsbury) said he desired to move the Amendment standing in his name on the Paper. The licence-holders desired that this question should be submitted to the Government, and he hoped a fair and favourable hearing would be given to their application. It was felt that it was not clear in the clause, as it was at present worded, whether "unsuitable" was to be "structural unsuitability" or not. The word "structurally" did not appear in connection with "unsuitable." If the word "structurally" governed "unsuitable," of course that would partly meet his case. What was felt by those who held licences was that, unless this point was made quite clear, there might be an interpretation given to those words by justices which might be made a pretext for getting rid of licences without compensation. There were houses which had been in existence for a good many years, the suitability of which had never been submitted to the justices. On the other hand, there were houses the plans of which had been submitted to the justices and which had been passed by them. Then there was another class which might be called upon to rectify any deficiency in that part of the premises where the trade was carried on. The Act of 1902 only dealt with rectifying these deficiencies. When they came to structural suitability that enlarged the scope of the matter very considerably. Structural suitability applied to the whole of the structure, and it might happen that the justices, as a pretext for getting rid of a house, would say, for example, that there ought to be suitable accommodation there for sleeping and stables for cyclists and motorists, and possibly lavatories and out-houses. It might be that some of these houses had been built upon plans approved by the justices, and yet if they desired to get rid of the licence they might seize upon this pretext and say that the house was unsuitable in the particulars he had mentioned and the licence in this way might be taken away without compensation. "Unsuitable" was a relative term, and it might be that the unsuitability referred to the position of the house. The magistrates might say that public-houses ought not to be kept at the corner of streets, or that a larger house ought to be erected. On the other hand, they might say that licensed houses should only be in front streets and not in back streets. Therefore it was possible that they might have houses closed without compensation because these new views had arisen in the minds of the justices. He thought there was a good deal of force in the apprehensions felt by those who owned these licences, and to protect their interests they felt that it was necessary that the word "structurally" should be inserted before the word "unsuitable." If that word were introduced it might go part of the way towards meeting the objections of those who were afraid that they might be deprived of the benefit of their premises on the ground of "unsuitability" when the magistrates were really influenced by some other consideration. He thought, however, that when the justices themselves had prevented a house from being made structurally suitable by the tenant, it would be a very unjust course to turn round on the tenant and deprive him of his right of compensation on the very ground that the house was structurally unsuitable.

*MR. LAWSON WALTON said that under the existing law the magistrates had discretionary power to refuse the renewal of a licence because the premises were unsuitable. If they were unsuitable for the trade they ought not to be licensed, and surely it would be an attempt to fetter unduly their wide discretion in the interests of the public to say that the justices should issue licences to premises which they admitted were unsuitable. The hon. and learned Member for Shrewsbury had pointed out that the words "structural deficiency" might indicate different things. There was first the unsuitability arising from structural causes. He should have thought it was clear that if the licensed premises were ill-adapted, or if they were structurally deficient or unsuitable for the trade, the justices might in their discretion, subject to appeal to quarter sessions, refuse to renew a licence. Secondly, supposing there was a house structurally adequate but, owing to gross neglect on the part of the tenant, owing to its filthy condition and the lack of proper care, was unsuitable, surely these reasons were just as important for refusing a licence as "structural deficiency," and therefore the real question was whether the premises were suitable or not. If they were not suitable the magistrates ought to have the power to refuse the licence. It was not the kind of question that ought to be left to the administrative committee at quarter sessions to decide whether compensation should be given under these circumstances. It should be disposed of by the justices on the spot.

MR. MARKHAM said the Amendment would mean that the magistrates would have no power in the future over licensed premises which came into the market. Practically it would mean that the justices would have no power to refuse a renewal if the Amendment were passed. The Bill had, therefore, come to a very curious stage. The brewers were not content with what they had got, but came to the House of Commons and asked to have words excluded from the Bill which would enable any bad, rotten, or defective building to be used as licensed premises over which the justices would have no power whatever. If the words "structurally deficient or unsuitable" were left out all the power in the hands of the magistrates would be gone. He hoped the Government would say at once that they were not going to weaken the power of the magistrates, but leave in their hands the discretionary power they had at present of refusing licences if the premises were deficient and unsuitable for the purposes of the business. He hoped the Government would give an answer at once to this question, for by so doing they would expedite the progress of business.

SIR EDWARD CARSON said it was impossible for the Government to accept a proposal to leave out the word "unsuitable." For the purposes of police supervision, for instance, it might be necessary to order certain doors of a house to be closed. It was also often necessary, in connection with premises which were not structurally deficient for business, to order that the drinking part of the premises should be shut off from the other parts. That was structural unsuitability, and not structural deficiency, having reference to the carrying on of the business. It was necessary that they should retain in the hands of the magistrates all those rights which gave them a disciplinary power over licensed premises.

SIR ROBERT REID said he was glad that this word was going to be retained, and that was quite right from the point of view of the Government. The Solicitor-General had also put a construction upon the word "unsuitable" in this connection with which he agreed. The word "unsuitable" was governed by the word "structurally," and therefore nothing but structural unsuitability would be hit by those words. There was, however, one danger of which the hon. and learned Member for Leeds had given an illustration. Supposing the premises were kept in such a dirty, insanitary state as to make them unsuitable and undesirable for the carrying on of the trade. As the law now stood the magistrate could say, "If you do not put your premises right you shall not have your renewal." Under this Bill the magistrates could not say that unless the word "ill-conducted" had the very full significance which the Solicitor-General seemed to attribute to it. He did not think it was safe to rely on the construction which the Judges would put upon the expression "ill-conducted."

And, it being half-past Seven of the clock, the Chairman left the Chair to make his Report to the House.

Committee report Progress; to sit again this evening.

EVENING SITTING.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL (GENERAL POWERS) BILL (BY ORDER).

As amended, considered.

MR. HERBERT ROBERTSON (Hackney, S.) said he had three Amendments on the Paper, all of which really related to the same matter, namely, the provisions of Clause 20, which dealt with vermin-infested houses. He considered that the proposals in the Bill were far too drastic, though he did not wish to minimise in the least the inconvenience arising from the conditions indicated. There was a small insect which was known for its powers of springing and hopping, but it, he thought, was hardly within the purview of the Bill, because he could not imagine that any enactment of this House would really be of avail against that insect. There was another insect, of which he understood there was a considerable number in the county of London, and which he might term a round, flat insect. That was the insect with which this clause dealt. He pointed out that the borough councils, which were the local authorities, had already various powers with regard to nuisances which injured health. It had never been shown, and he apprehended that it could not be shown, that the existence of this class of vermin was injurious to health. [AN HON. MEMBER: Oh!] If it were injurious to health, the existing Acts would undoubtedly apply, and there would be no occasion for any further provision in the present Bill. If it were merely proposed to treat houses infested with the nuisance in the same manner as nuisances which were injurious to health were treated by Sections 4 and 5 of the London Public Health Act, 1891, he should have no objection at all. It was not so much the question of penalty which he objected to. Section 20 of this Bill enabled, or rather almost compelled, a local authority, not upon its own initiative but upon the initiative of its medical officer, to do certain repairs in the house. It might be to repaper it, or to take down plaster work. These alterations might be very expensive; and the real point of his objection to the clause was that these alterations and repairs could be done without the local authority having first to obtain an order from a magistrate. The whole duty was cast by the Bill on the medical officer. It was true that the medical officer had to satisfy the sanitary authority that the house was infested with vermin, but that seemed to him to be almost compulsory on the mere production of a certificate by the medical officer. It did not appear that any discretion was left to the local authority as to whether the work was required or not. The local authority was entitled to do any work required by the notice to be done and summarily to recover as a civil debt all reasonable costs and expenses incurred from the person making default. Under the Public Health Act of 1891, in respect of nuisances coming within the scope of Sections 4 and 5, the sanitary authority had to complain to the petty sessional court, which could issue any one of four orders. It could issue an abatement order, a prohibition order, a closing order, or a combination of such orders. It appeared to him that Section 5 of that Act applied to houses infested with vermin, and that if the court issued an order it would be an abatement order. The Act provided, "Moreover the local authority may enter the premises to which the nuisance relates, and do whatever may be necessary to execute that order." He had not the slightest objection to that. It seemed to be the right and proper method of procedure, but that was not the provision of this Bill. By Section 20 if a person failed to comply with the notice given to him then and there, the sanitary authority had a right to do the work required by the notice, and to recover all reasonable costs. That appeared to him to be placing too large a power in the hands of the local authority. Some of the repairs ordered by the local authority must take the form of what was called decoration. He used the word "decoration" in a technical sense. That was a very serious matter, because every person who had had experience in building houses knew that the decoration was more costly than the bricks and mortar. He objected to the local authority having power to do that work without first obtaining an order from a magistrate.

"In page 15, line 13, after the word 'require' to insert the words—'(2) If a person upon whom a notice has been served as aforesaid makes default in complying with any of the requisitions thereof within the time specified, the sanitary authority shall make a complaint under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, and the petty sessional Court hearing the complaint may make on such person a summary order requiring each person to comply with all or any of the requisitions of the notice.'"—(Mr. Herbert Robertson.)

Question proposed. "That those words be there inserted."

MR. HEYWOOD JOHNSTONE (Sussex, Horsham), as Chairman of the Committee which considered this Bill, said there was no question before the Committee as to the necessity of a subsection of this character. He did not feel any doubt in his own mind as to the nature of the decision the Committee came to in this case. Evidence had been given before the Committee showing that in many cases there were eight or ten layers of wall-paper on the walls of many houses, within each layer of which vermin were breeding. It was also shown that 70 per cent. of the houses in some districts were verminous, and there was no dispute as to giving the local sanitary authorities power to enter and cleanse houses of this description. The sum and substance of it was that there could not be the slightest question as to the necessity for a clause of this nature, and the only question that remained was as to the machinery that was required to carry it out. They had two models before them, the London Public Health Act of 1891, and the Public Health Act of 1875, which applied to the rest of the country. As his hon. friend had mentioned, there was n the London Act a process by getting an order from the magistrate, but the Committee were told by the medical officers that they had not been able to take action in regard to this particular nuisance under that Act. The Committee therefore proceeded on the lines of the general Public Health Act of 1875. That was the precedent which had been followed in this Bill. The Committee had evidence before them that there were cases in which the owner had taken every possible precaution to hand over houses to incoming tenants in a clean and satisfactory condition, and that in a very short time they came to be infested with a large quantity of verminous insects. It would be quite unfair to make an order against the owner to be at the expense of cleansing a house the dirtiness of which was due to the incoming tenant. On the other hand they might have a case of an innocent tenant coming into a house which was apparently clean, having a fresh paper on the wall over a series of old papers. Vermin might break out there, and there was hardly any possibility of stating, without examination, whether the owner or the occupier was responsible for that until the work was actually done. Therefore, the Committee followed the precedent of the 1875 Act, and gave the authority power to proceed against either the owner or occupier as might seem to them good. They tried to hold the balance as fairly as possible, and they thought it was better that the work should be done by the borough councils, who were accustomed to work of this character. The only point at issue was the way in which machinery should be set up for carrying out a course the desirability of which was admitted on all hands.

MR. JOHN BURNS (Battersea) said the speech of the hon. Member opposite practically rendered any further support of this clause unnecessary. He wished the House to understand that this clause was not the result of the London County Council's, action. The people who took the initiative were the London borough councils, which were the local sanitary authorities. The Committee were practically unanimous that such a measure as this was absolutely necessary in respect of verminous houses. The twenty-eight parish councils of London, the port sanitary authority, and the city Corporation were all in favour of it, and the County Council were, therefore, only the medium for carrying out the wishes of all these authorities. Under the existing Health Acts a verminous house was not a nuisance. The hon. Member for Hackney thought that the provisions in the Bill, declaring that the verminous building was a source of danger to the community, was too drastic a treatment for chasing bugs and pursuing fleas. In regard to factory inspection, if a factory inspector went into a workshop and found mouse traps or flea powder about, he could order that workshop to be whitewashed and kept sanitarily clean; and if the owner did not do it, the local authority could intervene and do the work itself, and charge the cost to the owner. If that could be done in regard to a workshop, surely it ought to be done in overcrowded tenements. In some parts of London the condition of these tenements was horrible and a source of great irritation to men, women, and children. The hon. Member for Hackney thought that the repairs in a house should not be executed without receiving an order from a magistrate; but the London magistrates, who did their work exceedingly well, ought not to be overburdened, and compelled before they made an order in regard to cleanliness to make a visit to the house. The hon. Member for Hackney said he had never seen a bug in the East End of London, but Dr. Priestly mentioned a case of a room occupied by a doctor of divinity which had not been cleaned for nine years, and another officer stated that on one occasion he went to a house in Wood Green where he caught 118 fleas. He liked the London magistrates too well to subject them to the visitation of such houses.

Mr. BOUSFIELD (Hackney, N.) said that the drastic powers proposed in the clause might properly be given to local authorities with regard to infectious diseases. But in the case of vermin, which primarily were not dangerous to health, although they might be uncomfortable, no harm would be done by a delay of a couple of days in applying for a magistrate's order. There was no opportunity provided by the clause of having a case fairly heard and fairly determined.

Mr. CROOKS (Woolwich) said that the hon. Member for Hackney had declared he had not seen a bug in the East End, but if the hon. Member were to come down to where he lived he would show him that night people sitting on the doorsteps because vermin had taken possession of their houses, and where poor little children were scratching themselves until they made a sore on account of the vermin. He was pleading for poor people who were unable to do anything for themselves. He could assure the House that he had seen rooms with eight layers of paper on, and how was it possible to keep a place of that kind clean? He knew of a case, in the Ann Street area, where the death rate had run up to sixty per thousand. The magistrate was invited to visit the place, and was told that that was the only place where these people could go to, while the owner of the houses said he had made the rooms as comfortable as he could, and had put on a new paper! The local authorities had to apply to the magistrate four or five times before they could get a closing order, and then they had to pay compensation to the owner. Could anyone believe that these poor people could live in such houses in health? [An Hon. Member: Nobody disputes that.] Then why were they wasting time in opposing this clause? The House might have been on the beer long before this time. What the County Council wanted was to cleanse places that were filthy, and surely London was as much entitled to a clause of this kind as any provincial town. He hoped the House would at once pass the clause.

Mr. J. W. WILSON (Worcestershire, N.) said that the Clause dealt with the method of procedure in cleansing verminous places. No layman would advocate two processes at law when one would be sufficient to meet the case. He opposed the Amendment.

Question put, and negatived.

Dr. AMBROSE (Mayo, W.) said he wished to move the omission of Clause 46 by which the County Council took power to supply food to the inmates of their lodging-houses. This was an objectionable example of municipal trading, and direct competition with small traders who catered for the poorer neighbourhoods. There had been a deputation from lodging-house keepers, who lived practically on the profits derived from the sale of food to the inmates of lodging-houses, to protest against this clause. He would withdraw his Amendment if assured that some limit would be placed on the number of municipal lodging-houses, and that the Council did not intend to erect more of them.

Amendment proposed to the Bill—

Mr. JOHN BURNS said that on the part of the London County Council he could give no such assurance as was asked for by the hon. Member for Mayo. If the hon. Member were to consult his poor compatriots in various parts of London, he would find that they were practically unanimous in favour of the clause. The London County Council only asked the power to cater for the tenants in their lodging-houses, the same as was possessed by any West End club, or by the House of Commons itself. The tenants would have cheaper and better food than at present. As to the small shopkeepers, there was really no ground for complaint, because two-thirds of the food which lodgers consumed was bought off the premises. The power asked for was to provide the lodgers with food when the small shops were closed on a Saturday night or Sunday, or when the shopkeepers were having a holiday. There were 514 lodging-houses in London, and of that number the London County Council had only built and owned two in the last sixteen years. Personally, he was opposed to the London County Council building more. He did not believe in celibate masses of men being crowded in lodging-houses, whether private or municipal; but so long as they had these masses to deal with, it was right to see that they were comfortably kept and obtained food under decent conditions. The London County Council found, just as the late Lord Rowton—who deserved the gratitude of every poor man in London—found with his lodging-houses, that when the catering was left to private enterprise, the food supplied was unsatisfactory, and that the lodgers got margarine instead of butter. It had been said that this was an extension of municipal trading, but Sir Richard Farrar, who was no municipal trader, came forward and begged the Committee to give the London County Council this power. He himself knew that in their two lodging-houses — one at Deptford, and the other near Covent Garden—poor chaps would come in with only a sixpence in their pocket, which allowed them but 2d. for breakfast. It was their duty to see that these poor chaps got value for their money. The Council did not intend to make a profit, nor would the ratepayers sustain a loss. If there was a slight profit at the end of the year, there was no reason why these poor men should not be given a Christmas dinner. He asked the House to endorse the unanimous decision of the Committee.

Mr. HEYWOOD JOHNSTONE said he would ask hon. Members to consider how they would like to have to leave the House of Commons, purchase their own food, and then return and cook it. There was no question of municipal trading involved with the Clause. The Committee, fortified by the opinion of Sir Richard Farrant, who was managing director of the Artisans' Dwellings Company and Chairman of the Rowton houses—a gentleman of unique experience—unanimously came to the conclusion that it would be for the advantage of the administration of these houses and for the comfort of the lodgers that they should have an opportunity of getting what they required provided and cooked for them in the houses in which they lived. Mr. John Hunt, the town clerk of Westminster, gave similar evidence.

Captain JESSEL (St. Pancras, S.) said that as the clause was now drawn there was no reason to fear that the Council would compete with the small shopkeeper. He therefore thought that the hon. Member would be well advised to withdraw his opposition. At the same time, he thought that the hon. Member for Battersea might make a concession in this matter by limiting the clause to these two particular lodging-houses. If the London County Council annexed a number of lodging-houses it would be a special danger in London, because, if men were housed so comfortably they would not get married, and that would be hard on the spinsters of the Metropolis.

Mr. LAWRENCE (Liverpool, Abercromby) said that as a London ratepayer he would protest against the withdrawal of the Amendment. He had never heard a case advanced with fewer or weaker arguments. His hon. friend compared the lodging-houses with the House of Commons. But hon. Members did not make this House their home; and he did not, therefore, see the analogy. The hon. Member for Battersea said that the London County Council initiated these lodging-houses as model dwellings; but that work had happily been carried out by Lord Rowton. The London County Council did not know how far it might be carried. To his mind it was undesirable that the Council should enter into competition with private enterprise in this matter. Neither did he think that it would add to the dignity of the Council; and he wished to protest against the extension of the principle.

DR. AMBROSE said that after the explanation of the hon. Member for Battersea he would ask leave to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Bill to be read the third time.

Clause 1:—

Amendment again proposed—

*MR. H. D. GREENE said he would ask leave to withdraw his Amendment. It was, however, patent that there was great ambiguity in the words he desired to omit. The hon. and learned Member for Dumfries Burghs and the hon. and learned Member for South Leeds had disagreed as to their effect. The hon. and learned Member for South Leeds contended that the magistrates would be entitled under the words to refuse the renewal of a licence if the furniture was bad or insufficient or if the house stood at a corner or near a church or was removed from police supervision. If the hon. and learned Member were right, the Committee had wasted a great deal of time in discussing a previous Amendment with reference to remoteness from police supervision. The Government would vote against his Amendment for one reason; the Opposition would vote against it for another reason; and as there would, therefore, be certain to be a majority against it, he would ask leave to withdraw it.

MR. AINSWORTH (Argyllshire) said he thought it would be very desirable if the Amendment were accepted, as it would have the effect of not only improving the houses, but also the character of the business carried on within them. When the structure of a house was improved, the character of the business was also improved. He would appeal to hon. Gentlemen who were interested in the trade. Was not their great object to advance the cause of temperance and to raise the trade to the highest possible level? Therefore, they ought to seek every opportunity to improve the structure of licensed houses. He would appeal to the Home Secretary to accept the Amendment.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. BOUSFIELD said it might save time if his Amendment were taken next.

*THE CHAIRMAN: There are eight Amendments before that of the hon. Gentleman.

MR. WHITLEY (Halifax) said he would be quite willing to give way to the hon. Gentleman.

*THE CHAIRMAN: I cannot pick and choose between Amendments. I will call on hon. Gentlemen in the order in which the Amendments appear. Mr. Whitley.

MR. WHITLEY said his Amendment was to insert after "unsuitable" the words "or of insufficient value." He moved it in order to ascertain whether the Bill would continue or destroy the existing law with regard to qualification in the form of rateable value. It had been suggested to him that unless these words were inserted, the law with regard to rateable value would cease to operate. All he desired was that existing legislation in this respect should not be cancelled by the Bill. It was very undesirable that houses of low rateable value should be licensed. He would ask the Solicitor-General to give the Committee his views on the matter.

"In page 1, line 7, after the word "unsuitable,' to insert the words 'or of insufficient value.'"—(Mr. Whitley).

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. AKERS-DOUGLAS (Kent, St. Augustine's) thought there was no necessity for the Amendment. Section 44 of the Act of 1872 provided that a licence granted in respect of premises not of the required value was void, and he was satisfied that the Bill did not affect the powers which the hon. Member desired to preserve.

SIR ROBERT REID said that the Committee must, of course, accept the statement of the Home Secretary. Insufficiency of value was a ground for objecting to a renewal; and he agreed that that disqualification was not abolished by the Bill. But what would happen would be that the decision as to qualification would be remitted to quarter sessions, and would no longer remain with the licensing justices.

SIR EDWARD CARSON said that the licence-holder would apply to the brewster sessions, and if the brewster sessions found that the premises were not of the required qualification then the licence would be refused; but the applicant might appeal to quarter sessions. They wanted to make the matter perfectly clear; but if they inserted one disqualification and omitted others it would leave room for argument afterwards. Section 44 of the Act of 1872 would not be interfered with. He would, however, undertake to insert in line 9 after "licence" the words "or on the ground that the renewal would be void."

MR. SAMUEL EVANS said he was not sure that the arrangement in regard to quarter sessions was at all wise. Before the Act of 1872 no qualification was necessary; and there was now no reason why the exemptions in the Act of 1872 should be continued. He thought the words suggested by the Solicitor-General would be advisable.

MR. ASQUITH: I understand the right hon. Gentleman will introduce the words.

SIR EDWARD CARSON: Yes, Sir.

MR. WHITLEY said that on that understanding he would withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. BOUSFIELD, believing that it was of the utmost importance to preserve if they could the present disciplinary powers of the magistrates in their full force, moved the insertion after "unsuitable" of the following words—"or that the licensee refuses or has wilfully neglected to comply with any reasonable requirement of the justices." The magistrates at present had power to ask an applicant for a pledge that any practice which they considered undesirable, such as the negotiating of sailors' advance notes, should be discontinued, and if the request was not acceded to they might, at the next licensing sessions, on consideration of all the facts, refuse the renewal of the licence. It was very desirable that that power should be preserved, and the first part of the Amendment would apply to a refusal to comply with such a demand when the application was first made. The second part would come into force if an applicant promised to comply with the requirement and failed to carry out his undertaking. The object of the Amendment was simply to preserve intact the disciplinary powers of the magistrates. It was impossible to catalogue all the cases in which magistrates in the exercise of their discretion might make some requisition upon applicants for licences; the only way in which the object could be attained was by the insertion of general words such as he proposed. It might possibly be urged that "reasonable requirements" was a vague term, but the word "reasonable" was very familiar to lawyers, and in practice little difficulty arose as to its construction. Magistrates and Judges were reasonable men, and it would be a fairly easy task for them to decide whether or not a particular requirement was reasonable. Personally he would be prepared to trust entirely to their discretion, but, if the Committee were not prepared to go so far as that, the matter might be allowed to go to the High Court on a special case. It had been urged that to bring cases of refusal to comply into the category of licences which might be refused without compensation was too severe a penalty, but that was really where the matter stood at present. The reason the penalty never became operative was simply that the fear of its operation secured the fulfilment of the requirements. It did not at all follow that because the matter was left to the magistrates there would not be compensation. A discretion in such cases might be left to quarter sessions, on appeal, to grant compensation. He begged to move.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 1, line 7, after the word 'unsuitable' to insert the words 'or that the licensee refuses or has wilfully neglected to comply with any reasonable requirements of the justices.'"—(Mr. Bousfield.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Sir EDWARD CARSON said this was practically the same point which the Committee had discussed in the afternoon, although the words were different, and he would not repeat his speeches showing that where the circumstances were such that the magistrates ought to retain discretionary power they could do so by virtue of the provision that the premises must be well conducted. If the words now proposed were accepted the magistrates would have the power of getting rid of the obligation to compensate. They might arbitrarily require the licence-holders to close their houses at certain hours or on certain days, and who was to say afterwards that any requirement of theirs was unreasonable? Was the Committee prepared to say that a licensee should be deprived of all benefit from the insurance fund to which he had been contributing simply because the magistrates did not approve, for instance, of the tied-house system, and required a licensee to terminate certain agreements? As to the suggested appeal not only to quarter sessions, but to the High Court, he submitted that it was hardly possible to bring up the matter not on questions of law, but on questions of fact, before the High Court.

Mr. BOUSFIELD said he did not suggest it would be necessary; he simply said that might be done as a safeguard.

Sir EDWARD CARSON thought the hon. Member must have believed there was some necessity for it or he would not have mentioned it. Moreover, there was nothing in the Amendment about a qualified discretion to give compensation on the part of quarter sessions, and he could not see how the hon. and learned Member would propose to set it up, or the extent to which the discretion should be given. He really thought the matter had been discussed at sufficient length, and that it was the same question as had been divided upon earlier in the evening.

Sir ROBERT REID agreed with the Solicitor-General that the subject-matter of the Amendment in one form or another had been for a considerable time before the Committee, but they had not yet come to a definite understanding with regard to what ought to be done. The Solicitor General had stated that it was no part of the intention of the Government to diminish the primary jurisdiction of the justices, but it had been shown that in three different matters it would be diminished, and these words effected this—that local justices might continue to refuse renewal, where there had been a refusal to carry out reasonable requirements. That was not provided by the Bill as it stood. He was unable to follow the Solicitor-General in his view as to "reasonable requirements." The right hon. and learned Member was doubtless aware of cases in which there had been ties or relationship between the employer and the manager of a tied house which were contrary to public policy or interest. All tied houses were not bad, but some were, and in certain cases conditions that were inadvisable existed. In such cases the magistrates were able to say that, unless those conditions were altered, they would refuse the licence on the next application, and in that way they were able to exercise their disciplinary powers to prevent abuses of the relations between the tenant and the owner of a tied house. He thought the Solicitor-General would agree that such a case would not, under the Bill, come within the discretion of the magistrates without compensation.

Sir EDWARD CARSON: Not without compensation.

Sir ROBERT REID said it was within the power of the justices at present, and he had understood from the right hon. Gentleman that all such power was to be retained.

Sir EDWARD CARSON: Disciplinary power as regards the conduct of the house.

Sir ROBERT REID said that that was not what he understood the Solicitor-General to say before. At any rate, the direct result of the clause would be to withdraw from the magistrates a power which they had hitherto been able to exercise in the interests of public order and utility. Why should that power be withdrawn? It had nothing whatever to do with compensation. The insertion of the words "and lawful" would meet the case suggested by the Solicitor-General of a requirement to close a public-house between certain hours.

MR. STUART WORTLEY (Sheffield, Hallam) said the question was really whether local magistrates should be allowed, without Parliamentary or other sanction, to create a body of local laws for themselves. If justices on public grounds proposed to create what was really a new local law, he submitted that a licensee who refused to agree to the proposition was really in the position of having his licence withdrawn on public grounds, and was therefore entitled to compensation. If, however, the licensee had given an undertaking to comply with certain requirements and had omitted to carry out that undertaking it would be a different matter; it might then be a question of misconduct. That was a distinction the hon. and learned Member had failed to make.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE said that the mischief created by the Bill was that in future no undertakings would be given by the publican because he would know that he might refuse to give an undertaking and yet receive full compensation. The Solicitor-General had admitted that the magistrates now could ask for compliance with reasonable requirements from the licensee, and that if he refused they could withhold the licence. In future, under the Bill as it stood, they could not do so. All that this Amendment asked was that the power of the magistrate should be preserved. If the Government refused to do that, they would make it clear that not on one point only but on several points they were filing down the power of the magistrates and increasing that of the licensee, thus making the property more valuable. Amendments of the kind now proposed could have been introduced perfectly consistently with the principle of compensation, and he was at a loss to understand the objection to the words now proposed. The Solicitor-General had instanced demands that were perfectly illegal. Public-houses were compelled by Act of Parliament to be open within certain hours.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The law does not say that.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE submitted that licence-holders were compelled to give refreshment to any wayfarer who might knock at their doors between certain hours, and no bench of magistrates would dream of making a requirement contrary to Act of Parliament.

*SIR J. STIRLING-MAXWELL (Glasgow, College) supported the Amendment, which he regarded as one of first-class importance. The speech of the Solicitor-General showed that he had very little faith in his licensing authorities, as he was unwilling to trust them with any discretion whatever. In the discussion on the Scottish Licensing Bill the Committee asked the Secretary for Scotland to put in powers which would enable the licensing authorities to do legally what they had hitherto done illegally—make requirements to which licensees had to agree before they could be assured that their licences would be renewed. That policy had been carried on in Scotland with the best results. The Secretary for Scotland declined to put such powers into his Bill. He and his friends regretted it; but the Committee must remember that the Secretary for Scotland left what was much more important—the discretion of the magistrates to take away licences when they liked without any special reason. If the whip-hand was left to the magistrates there would be no need to give them power to make special rules, but if the whip-hand was taken away from the magistrates, as it was by this Bill, he thought they ought to be given power to make such rules as they thought necessary when they gave licences. The rules would have no sanction at all unless disregard of them involved the loss of the licence without compensation. The mere fact that the licence could be withdrawn with compensation would carry no weight whatever, because the publicans would have only to combine to resist the rules and the compensation fund would not be sufficiently deep to allow the authorities to withdraw all the licences involved. He hoped that the Government would reconsider the question.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR said his hon. friend had unwittingly given an erroneous impression of the attitude taken up by the Government on the Scottish measure. His hon. friend appeared to think that the view taken by the Scottish Office at that time was that there should be an unlimited discretion given to magistrates to place such conditions upon the licence-holder as they might happen to think reasonable. That was the Amendment, but it was not the Scottish Bill. The Government had never denied that they regarded the present Bill as a great measure, first for diminishing the number of licences without hardship, and, secondly, as being likely to improve the conduct and character of the public-houses that remained by giving some kind of reasonable security to the licence-holder. Those were the two objects of the Bill, which they had never for a moment disguised from the House. How would the second of those objects be affected by this Amendment, which contradicted the Scottish measure on a fundamental point? Suppose there was a cranky bench of magistrates "Oh" — was that an incredible supposition? [An Hon. Member: We have a cranky Government.] That might be so, but there were remedies against the errors of a cranky Government. That question, however, seemed to him to be somewhat outside the scope of the Amendment they were now discussing. Take the case of a cranky Bench. Such things had been known. It was really unreasonable to say that a man should lose all security in his holding when the magistrates had gone outside the law, except such security as might be got on appeal to a less cranky Court. This Bill left the offences of the licence-holder exactly where they were; it might or might not be for the public good that additional conditions should be added to the many conditions that now bound him, but that was outside this Bill, and was surely not a matter to be left to the unfettered discretion of the magistrates. They did not want in one district of the county one set of conditions and in the neighbouring county another set of conditions, because in that case the licence-holders would hold their licences under an entirely different tenure. He could not believe that such a state of things would be either good sense or good legislation. By all means let such restrictions be placed upon licence-holders as were necessary in the public interest, but they should not allow benches of magistrates in one district to have an entirely different set of conditions from those which applied to their neighbours probably in the same county.

The Committee should remember what it was doing. They were saying to the licence-holder that his licence was held not upon conditions laid down by the House of Commons, and not even on conditions considered by this House or by any Department responsible to this House, but upon conditions laid down by three or four gentlemen who were directly responsible to nobody, and with regard to whose decisions the only check was an appeal to a legal tribunal. One of the reasons why they were bringing in this Bill was that the security given by the existing system was inimical both in the interests of temperance and in the interests of justice. That might be an erroneous view, but it was the view of the Government, and it was surely unreasonable to ask them in this connection to run counter to the general principles upon which they had framed the Bill. The House ought either to lay down the actual conditions which constituted ill-conduct, or they ought to leave it, under broad safeguards, to some Department of the Government to lay down; but to leave it to individual Benches would, he thought, produce very great hardships. He was perfectly prepared to give the subject his very best consideration, as his hon. and learned friend desired; but no argument had, in his opinion, been advanced which would justify the proposition that they should leave it absolutely to the magistrates to decide what was a reasonable and what was an unreasonable condition, and to make it a penalty of violating that reasonable condition that the man who thus violated it should lose his whole property without compensation. They wanted to remedy such injustice as was attached to that case. He wished particularly to ask the consideration of hon. Members to the fact that they were compelling every licence-holder, whether he liked it or not, to contribute to the insurance fund.

* MR. EMMOTT (Oldham): Is that in the Bill?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Certainly it is.

* MR. EMMOTT: But there is no compulsion.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said that if the hon. Member would look at the schedule he would see that the licence-holders were compelled to pay the licence duty.

* MR. EMMOTT: It says that they "may" be compelled by quarter sessions.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said that the licence-holder was compelled to insure his property. It seemed to him that, having regard to the fact that they compelled every licence-holder, whether he liked it or not, to contribute to the insurance fund, the introduction of the words "ill-conducted" gave ample scope to the magistracy to carry out the duties imposed on them, and he did not think they ought, unnecessarily and arbitrarily, to throw uncertainty into the whole procedure by adding words such as those of his hon. and learned friend. He granted that there were arguments to be used on the other side, but he ventured to suggest to the House, looking to the broad principle of the Bill, that the policy of the Government was based upon equitable considerations, and upon this question he was quite unable to alter the opinion which he had expressed to the House.

MR. WHITTAKER submitted that there were cases where it was obviously desirable that the Bench should be able to impose conditions not provided by law, and that they should be enabled to enforce them. There was the case of boarding-houses in seaside resorts to which licences were granted on the understanding that only those persons bona-fide living and boarding in the place should be supplied with drink. If the licence-holders persisted in disregarding that engagement by supplying anybody who liked to go into the place, he submitted that that would be a violation of the condition of the undertaking, and there ought not to be compensation, though under this Bill there would be compensation. There was also the case of hotels where an engagement was entered into that there should be no public bar with a door opening on to the street. Supposing there were frequent transfers and the magistrates found out that the licensed house was a man-trap; the house was doing little business, but it was used to get goodwill out of tenant after tenant. Under the Bill as it now stood if a licence were refused to such a house the owners would be compensated.

AN HON. MEMBER: How much would they be paid?

*MR. WHITTAKER: They would go into Court and show how much goodwill had been paid and get their compensation money on that basis. He was told only recently, by the chairman of a licensing bench that at the last brewster sessions they refused a number of licences where there had been frequent transfers, and at the time of the refusal to renew there were three persons who had been tenants of those houses in the workhouse and another had committed suicide. If houses of that kind had their licences refused the owners ought not to receive compensation. There was a case, recently, of a woman who had been so badly treated as the tenant of a licensed house that the magistrates transferred the licence to neighbouring premises in order that she might carry on the business in which she had been disturbed. That was a case in which the original licence-holder would have to be compensated under this Bill. The Solicitor-General now argued as if the magistrates were going to be eager to refuse compensation. At an earlier stage the argument of the Government had been that unless the justices were allowed to give compensation they would not reduce licences. He asked that some confidence should be reposed in the common sense of the magistrates and in their sense of justice. It was not treating them fairly to talk of "cranky Benches." That bore too much resemblance to the language addressed to the brewers when they waited upon the Prime Minister.

MR. ROBSON (South Shields) said the object of this Bill was to give compensation in cases where a publican lost his licence through no fault of his own, or because the house was not needed. It was never intended that there should be any restriction placed upon the power the magistrates at present possessed, or that there should be any loss of the control of magistrates over the business. There had grown up a practice on the part of the benches of magistrates to demand certain conditions upon the granting of licences. A very good illustration of the power they claimed to exercise was what was done in Liverpool. There the magistrates stipulated that there should be no liquor sold to children under a certain age, and in the case of barmaids and in other directions they were able to exercise a valuable disciplinary authority over the owners of licences. Was it intended by the Government to lessen this power on the part of the magistrates? There was no ground for the contention that the Amendment was an endeavour to revolutionise the law. The intention was only to alter the law in a specific particular. The Government declared that the Bill left the disciplinary powers of the magistrates untouched, yet it really deprived them of the only authority by which they could enforce those powers. That was, indeed, the feature of the Bill. It was no longer a Bill to establish compensation. It was a Bill to limit the powers exercised by magistrates. And the Prime Minister revealed the state of his mind very clearly in his reference to "cranky Benches." This was a Bill not only to protect the publican from the loss of his licence but also to protect him against "cranky magistrates;" that was a very serious extension of the scope of the Bill. What was meant by this phrase "cranky magistrates," except magistrates exercising their discretion in a way which the Prime Minister did not like? The matter was in the discretion of the magistrates, but because the Prime Minister thought it might be "crankily" exercised it was to be destroyed; and the publican was to be put beyond the reach of the magistrates even though they might impose upon him reasonable requirements. He thought the Prime Minister was giving an interpretation of reasonable requirements which was not according to law. The Amendment would only enable the magistrates to put upon the tenant requirements which were reasonable. A suggestion had been made that they should add to the word "reasonable" "and lawful." With the addition of these words there would be no ground for the fears of the Prime Minister. But in the absence of such an Amendment there was a dangerous extension of the scope of the Bill.

*SIR JAMES WOODHOUSE (Huddersfield) said that speaking as one who had had a long experience in the administration of the licensing laws he considered that an Amendment of this kind was necessary. He did not agree that the magistrates at the present time possessed the power which these words would give. Magistrates had constantly desired to grant limited licences such as those which had been referred to by the hon. Member for Spen Valley but there was no power under the Licensing Acts to grant limited licences.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: But there will be that power under this Act.

*SIR JAMES WOODHOUSE said he was afraid that the Prime Minister did not realise the effect of this Bill. In many large towns there was frequently a desire among those who kept restaurants and luncheon-rooms that intoxicating liquors should be sold to persons taking food or other refreshments, but the law allowed no limited licence to admit of this. A custom, however, had been followed of granting a licence upon the licensee giving an undertaking not to use it in the ordinary public-house manner. In such circumstances a bench of justices granted a licence, but after four or five years the applicant sold his licence to a brewer, and the new holder turned the premises into a regular public-house. The Bench with which he was connected granted a licence of this character, and the applicant sold it for a large sum of money to the brewers, and although that licence was granted purely for restaurant purposes it was turned into the full public-house licence.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: But that is misconduct.

*SIR JAMES WOODHOUSE said that was not so, because the licensee came up for a renewal of his licence, and the magistrates, holding that there had been a breach of the understanding upon which the licence was originally granted, refused to renew the licence. The then licensee, however, appealed to quarter sessions, and they said, "We have nothing to do with any conditions imposed by the city justices; all we know is that a licence was granted, and, as no misconduct has been proved, and the premises have not been ill-conducted, we shall grant this renewal." That very licence to-day was a full public-house licence. He put it to the Committee that if the words of this Amendment were inserted it would facilitate the granting of these limited licences.

A PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON: My Lords, before the business begins I wish to ask your Lordships' indulgence while I make a short personal explanation. On referring to the newspaper reports of what took place towards the end of the sitting on Tuesday I find a report of a speech by the Lord Chancellor which shows me that I had not heard his remarks upon that occasion. I am sorry to say that with advancing years I suffer somewhat from deafness, and I certainly did not hear what the noble and learned Lord said. I find that the rule which he laid down with regard to the authority of the Lord Chancellor as Speaker of the House was perfectly in accordance with the view I ventured to take. I feel bound to offer this explanation in order to make it clear that that was the case.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (The Earl of HALSBURY): My Lords, I am very glad that the noble Marquess has said what he has said, because, although I did not attribute to him any desire to mislead the House, his intervention on the occasion was calculated to mislead some of your Lordships as to what the true rule is. The rule is that the Speaker of the House of Lords, unlike the Speaker of the House of Commons, has no authority to decide what is out of order or what is not. That is for your Lordships to decide. But the Lord Chancellor has the same authority that other Peers have to rise to order, and speaking generally, during the eighteen years I have occupied this position, I have never intervened in any other way. It is always an invidious task to call a noble Lord to order, but unless the Lord Chancellor takes notice of a breach of order nobody else would. One consequence of that is that I am afraid your Lordships' House is not an example of order. When I intervene I do not claim any right to decide a point of order, but only the right to call attention to it.

[SECOND READING.]

Order of the Day or the Second Reading read.

LORD MUSKERRY: My Lords, in moving the Second Reading of this Bill I think the only excuse I need offer is that lives are still being unduly risked through the carriage of dangerous deck loads by British ships in the winter time. Previous representations of mine in this House on the subject have had no effect whatever in official quarters; therefore I am bringing forward this Bill so that we may have a clear issue before your Lordships' House. If I can, as I hope, furnish you with convincing proof that not one only, but very many of our seamen have found a watery grave through this practice of carrying these deck loads in the winter, then I have confidence in your Lordships giving my Bill your most earnest and sympathetic consideration.

As the Memorandum of this Bill states, it is an offence against the law for any vessel to arrive between the last day of October and the 16th day of April at any port in the United Kingdom carrying a deck cargo; that is to say, anything more than deals, battens, or light wood goods not exceeding 3 feet above the deck. There is a certain amount of grim humour in the fact that so long as the vessel does not discharge her deck cargo it is quite open for her to pay a visit to our shores, come into our ports, and get coal or provisions. There is no fear of punishment until such time as she lands a single log, when the machinery of the law is at once put in motion by the Board of Trade. To put it shortly, the law forbids as a dangerous practice the carriage of deck loads to the United Kingdom in winter, but our ships may carry them with impunity to the Continent. Therefore there is not a shadow of doubt that though the law says it is dangerous, the practice of carrying dangerous deck loads in the winter time goes on as merrily as ever. The only difference is that they are discharged on the Continent instead of in this country.

This Bill aims at consistency in the law and involves no difference in point of principle to the statute as it stands at present. In view of the evidence in specific cases I shall adduce, I will not dwell on the serious and unjustifiable risks which our sailors are expected to undertake. If your Lordships have ever observed the condition of vessels arriving at our large seaports with deck cargoes, even in summer time, you will the more fully appreciate the plight of such vessels lumbering across the Atlantic in winter with an enormous incubus above deck which, if breaking loose, will carry everything before it. It is a menace to all concerned. I now propose to deal with the disaster and misery which have arisen out of this practice of carrying dangerous deck loads in the winter time.

As I have never met with anything else, I suppose I must take it as a matter of course that the Marine Department of the Board of Trade will offer determined opposition to the Bill. My noble friend representing the Board will, I have no doubt, go as usual into percentages as to loss of life, but I would exhort your Lordships not to attach too much weight to statistics submitted in this form, for they are calculated to be most misleading. If, for instance, 100 ships carried deck cargoes across the North Atlantic, and it was proved that the deck cargo was the cause of the loss of one vessel, only, with her crew, then the proportion of disaster would be 1 per cent. only. This would appear to be a most insignificant proportion, but, I ask, what about the crew of thirty-five or forty men who have perished through being subjected to unjustifiable risks? Are they not worthy of consideration? Are their lives of no value? If one life, only, is thrown away from a preventable cause, then I contend that, if it cannot be prevented otherwise, the Legislature must step in. We do not wait for a terrible catastrophe on our railways before sanctioning measures to avoid danger. One single instance of loss of life furnishes amply sufficient basis for taking precautions for the avoidance of further sacrifice.

I will now deal with the facts concerning this loss of life which the Bill seeks to put an end to. The ss. "Mobile" was lost with all hands, and it is noteworthy that on the eve of this vessel's sailing from the United States the second officer communicated with his relatives, fearing the consequence of the ship being in such a dangerous condition owing to the huge deck cargo she was carrying. It is also worthy of note that the Merchant Service Guild forwarded copies of these letters to the Board of Trade at the time. The Board of Trade Inquiry—which is a Court constituted under the Merchant Shipping Act, having the advantage of the assistance of two expert nautical assessors—found that owing to her deck load the vessel was sent to sea in an unseaworthy condition. Twenty-six men lost their lives through this disaster. Somewhere about the same time the steamer "Huddersfield" experienced an accident, her deck cargo carrying adrift, and she was placed in a very perilous situation. Some of her crew were seriously injured. The Board of Trade Inquiry which was ordered to investigate the circumstances declared that—

> "This vessel also was sent to sea in an unseaworthy condition."

I might mention that the deck cargoes in both cases were being carried in the winter time to Continental ports. The "Mobile's" deck load of timber was estimated at being not less than 700 tons weight.

Then again there was the loss of the ss. "Cardinal," proceeding in winter time with a deck cargo. The Board of Trade Inquiry ordered to investigate the circumstances found that the loss of this vessel was caused by the deck cargo being washed overboard by heavy seas, carrying away her bulwarks and steering gear, and staving in the after hatches, thus rendering the vessel unmanageable and waterlogged. The Court, in giving judgment, said that—

> "Although the Merchant Shipping Act does not apply to a vessel like the 'Cardinal' bound to a Continental port in the winter time, still, having regard to the weight of the deck cargo carried and to the length and size of the great proportion of the pitch-pine logs of which it consisted, the Court is of opinion that the vessel, as laden, was not in a good and seaworthy condition when she left Pensacola on a winter voyage across the North Atlantic."

It was the opinion of the Court that the vessel was rendered unmanageable and lost by the weight and size of her deck cargo. Then, again, the report of the Board of Trade Inquiry which investigated the circumstances of the accident to the steamer "Firth of Forth" contains instructive reading on this matter of the carriage of deck loads. I do not wish to infer for one moment that the particular accident—a stranding—which was inquired into was caused by the deck load which she was carrying from the United States to the Continent; but, as furnishing proof of the statements contained in the Memorandum to the Bill, I may say that the annexe to the report of the Board of Trade Inquiry into this matter states that previous to the stranding of the vessel I have mentioned she had a list which increased considerably until she was almost on her beam ends. After a consultation with the chief officer, the master decided to cut the lashings and sacrifice the deck cargo. This is a performance much more difficult than might be imagined, and I have no hesitation in saying that if it had not been attended by good fortune the ship herself would have been sacrificed, and in all probability her crew as well.

Then comes the case of the loss of the "Blenheim," under the management of Messrs. Steel, Young & Co. of London. A Board of Trade Inquiry was ordered, and after hearing all the evidence, formulated their judgment. They found that the vessel met with heavy weather and consequently the deck load shifted, causing a great list to starboard and the vessel to ship large quantities of water. The Court stated that the cause of the deck load breaking adrift and the vessel taking a list to starboard was that she listed heavily and was struck by a heavy sea on the port side. Great damage was sustained by the vessel then and thereafter, and the Court stated that although they would have been of practically no assistance, no fewer than three of the deck pumps were inaccessible in consequence of the deck timber being stowed over them. They said that this disaster showed the wisdom of the statutory regulation that—

> "Vessels shall not carry deck loads of timber to discharge at ports in the United Kingdom in winter."

I would supplement this by the remark that this disaster shows the desirability of your Lordships giving your favourable consideration to this measure, which would prevent such vessels carrying deck-loads to the Continent.

The latest glaring case to which it is my painful duty to draw your Lordships' attention is the loss of the steamer "Salopia" together with her crew—twenty-two men all told. It is a very extraordinary thing that this vessel belonged to the same owners as the steamer "Blenheim," the loss of which I have already commented upon. I desire, however, to be perfectly fair in this matter and to say that the Board of Trade Inquiry added that the managing owner of this latter vessel—the "Salopia"—on signing the charter party of the vessel was not aware of the loss of the "Blenheim." It appears that he has declared he is determined not to carry winter deck cargoes in vessels of this class, but the Court very tersely stated that this does not seem to go far enough. I would ask your Lordships to support me in preventing other shipowners from carrying such deck cargoes, so that this particular owner may not have to meet with what he would consider as unfair competition. From the judgment of the Board of Trade Inquiry it appears that this missing steamer "Salopia" carried on deck no fewer than 585 logs. The Court highly disapproved of carrying a deck load during the winter months, stating that at this period of the year no deck load ought to be carried, and there is no beating about the bush in a plain statement of this character.

Your Lordships have heard on several different occasions when I have brought shipping matters forward replies by the noble Lord representing the Board of Trade in this House to the effect that the master of a ship must be allowed discretion in these matters. To those who know anything about the methods of present-day merchant ships this so-called discretion of the shipmaster is a hollow mockery. He is governed by custom and by the orders of his owners. If he does not load the full amount which the custom of the port indicates then on arrival home he is displaced by another master, but for obvious reasons the cause is not assigned. Shipmasters are therefore "between the devil and the deep sea." Their living must be their first consideration; therefore, in their anxiety to retain their positions, they carry full deck loads which, according to the disasters I have mentioned, constitute their vessels as unseaworthy and unfit for sea.

In furnishing your Lordships with independent proof of my statement on this point of "discretion," I will mention evidence which came out at three different Board of Trade Inquiries. In the case of the steamer "Cardinal" the owners wrote the captain that they desired him to carry as much as he could, safely and legally. It would have been all well and good if the owners had ended with this, but they proceeded to inform the master that if he went to the Continent they thought he was entitled to carry a larger quantity than to the United Kingdom; and if he was not acquainted with the custom in such cases he could procure authentic information at Pensacola where timber carrying is a speciality. In the face of such instruction and of the recognised custom, it is obvious that the master had no alternative but to carry a dangerous deck cargo. In the case of the loss of the "Blenheim," the owners wrote to the captain to say that the home market was simply in a desperate condition and they feared the present voyage was going to be a very poor one but they relied upon him doing his best to prevent a loss and hoped that a good cargo would be shipped. They pointed out that of course he would be allowed to carry a full deck load for the Continent compatible with the steamer's seaworthiness, and they trusted he would take full advantage of this liberty. Of course such instructions leave a loophole for escaping responsibility for the shipowners, but here again your Lordships will judge as to what discretion the master really had. He had absolutely none.

Lord Muskerry.

At the recent inquiry into the loss of the "Salopia" with all hands, the owners stated candidly that they expected the captain to take a deck cargo, but they left it to him to load her compatible with her seaworthiness. One of the nautical assessors on the Court, in reply to this statement, said that the captain depended upon the owners, and would carry perhaps a little more rather than incur their displeasure. The assessor pointed out that it was no more safe to carry deck cargoes to a foreign port than it was to an English port. I think I have adduced sufficient authority for saying that, although pains and penalties are visited upon the master, he has no discretion left to him in avoiding them.

I do not desire to trespass unduly on your Lordships' forbearance, and consequently I will not deal with the many letters received from shipmasters and officers appealing to me to help them in this matter by bringing it before your Lordships. I would wish to impress upon your Lordships the fact of their deplorable position in this matter. Their bread-and-butter must be their first consideration. If they do not follow the recognised custom they lose their positions on arrival home. Therefore I say that it is a grievance that demands remedy. Though they have no option as to carrying deck loads, they are yet held chiefly responsible. The Merchant Service Guild, which represents eleven thousand certificated captains and officers of merchant ships, has urged me to bring this subject before your Lordships, and to state how strongly they feel on this matter. The facts they have placed in my hands are such as no man possessing an atom of feeling can disregard. It is the captains and officers of our merchant navy upon whose practical experience we must rely in preventing undue risks to life on the high seas. If, as in this case, they emphatically condemn the carrying of deck cargoes in the winter time, your Lordships cannot but attach considerable weight to their representations—backed up as they have been by decisions, such as I have quoted, of legal Courts which have fully investigated certain disasters at sea caused by deck cargoes.

If, as I have foreshadowed, my noble friend representing the Board of Trade opposes the Bill, it is practically a certainty that the fine old crusted argument of foreign competition will be urged. Where this competition is at the expense of the lives of our seafaring fellow-subjects it is a question to be dealt with by the State. It seems to me an extraordinary argument that if foreign ships are allowed to proceed to sea in an unseaworthy condition, then it should—on the score of "competition"—be permissible for British ships to do likewise. The Board of Trade and the shipowners seem to be the only people who can convince the Legislature that "two blacks make a white." I always thought that Great Britain led the way in promoting safety of life at sea. Nowadays the tendency is to wait for the foreigner to make the first move. Norway is, I think, our only competitor to be considered seriously in the carriage of deck cargoes. I may inform your Lordships that the Norwegian Government have now adopted a measure stipulating that vessels carrying wood on deck must hold a surveyor's certificate as to their fitness to do so, and that the deck load must be so stowed as not to impede navigation or prevent free access to boats and other life-saving appliances. Norway, your Lordships will see, is quite impressed by the dangers of such cargoes.

Should your Lordships give this Bill a Second Reading, it will of course be open to Amendment in Committee. I implore your Lordships not to disregard, not my own views, but those of independent and impartial authorities on a cause of deplorable loss of life at sea. The fact that they have no direct means of representation in the Legislature should cause their claims to appeal to us all the more. Full of toil, care, responsibility, and risk, their lives are as precious to their parents, their wives, and their families as they should be to their country. I ask, then, that these lives should not be unduly jeopardised, and that dangers altogether outside the category of ordinary perils of the sea may be the subject of your Lordships' most earnest consideration.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."—(Lord Muskerry.)

Lord WOLVERTON: My Lords, although His Majesty's Government are not prepared to grant a Second Reading to this Bill, I think I may congratulate my noble friend on the very able and moderate manner in which he has brought this subject to your Lordships' notice. I think it would be as well if I read to your Lordships Section 451 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, which deals with the loading of timber. It runs as follows—

> "If a ship, British or foreign, arrives between the last day of October and the 16th day of April in any year at any port in the United Kingdom from any port out of the United Kingdom, carrying as deck cargo, that is to say, in any uncovered space upon deck, or in any covered space not included in the cubical contents forming the ship's registered tonnage, any wood goods as hereinafter defined, the master of that ship, and also the owner, if he is privy to the offence, shall be liable to a fine not exceeding £5 for every hundred cubic feet of wood goods carried in contravention of this section."

And then there is a proviso—

> "Nothing in this section shall affect any ship not bound to a port in the United Kingdom which comes into any port of the United Kingdom under stress of weather, or for repairs, or for any other purpose than the delivery of her cargo."

That, my Lords, is the existing law, and I can assure your Lordships that this section is vigorously enforced by the Board of Trade. During the years 1901 and 1902, there were convictions of twenty-two vessels for contravening this section, seventeen of which were foreign vessels.

As far as I can make out from the Bill and from the speech of my noble friend, he is desirous of including all British ships starting from a foreign port, and whose cargoes are consigned to foreign ports. That is the scope, I think, of his Bill. The noble Lord has mentioned in support of his proposal many cases where we regret there has been loss of life, and others in which the ship has foundered, but in which there has been no loss of life. I have particulars of all the cases he referred to, with the exception of that of the "Cardinal," and I find that the cause of their loss is not attributed altogether by the Commisioners who inquired into the cases to their carrying deck cargoes. In the case of the "Mobile," which the noble Lord mentioned first, the Court found that the vessel had insufficient stability, but, as she was chiefly laden with grain or cotton, she is not included in the table of timber-laden vessels foundered and missing. The next case to which the noble Lord referred was that of the "Huddersfield." In the case of this vessel the Court found that the casualty was due to the excessive height of the deck cargo. With regard to the "Salopia," the Court found that apart from the vessel carrying a deck load she was not unseaworthy, and they expressed the opinion that no deck load should be carried in winter months across the Atlantic.

I think I can show your Lordships by quoting the figures on this subject, that there has been a great diminution in the number of vessels lost from this cause. The number of lives lost in foundered timber-laden ships during the last four and a half years, was seventy-three, as against 327 in the previous four and a half years. As regards the trade between foreign ports, the number of vessels foundered and missing was eleven, and the number of lives lost fifty-five, during the past four and a half years; as against nineteen vessels, and 125 lives lost, in the preceding four and a half years. This very large diminution is chiefly due, I think, to the employment in this trade of steamers, which have largely taken the place of sailing vessels. In the figures I have quoted, I have not included the twenty-six lives lost in the "Mobile," for the reason I have given.

I now come to the question of foreign competition. As your Lordships are aware, foreign competition in the seafaring world is very keen, and if your Lordships grant a Second Reading to this Bill you will be doing a thing that you have never assented to before—you will be placing restrictions on British ships which you are unable to impose on ships of foreign nations. I admit that if we could get all foreign nations to adopt Section 451 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, it would be extremely desirable, but before that could be done we should have to approach those Powers on the subject. The noble Lord made, I think, a rather strong attack on shipowners. I am not able, I must admit, to follow the noble Lord into that question, but I cannot help saying that in my opinion the general body of shipowners in England are only too anxious to do what they can for the safety and comfort of the men who go to sea in their vessels. I regret that His Majesty's Government are unable to consent to the Second Reading of this Bill.

THE DUKE OF RUTLAND: My Lords, I have no intention whatever of entering into the technical details of this Bill, but when I hear competition alleged as a reason why it should not be read a second time my memory goes back to the great and prolonged debates in the House of Commons on the subject of factory legislation. The great argument of Mr. Bright and Mr. Cobden, and even of Sir Robert Peel, against the passing of the Ten Hours Bill was that it would subject English manufacturers to unjust competition with their foreign competitors. That was the ground of the great resistance made to those remedial measures of that time, and it seems to me that the argument of the noble Lord in opposition to this Bill is based upon precisely the same ground—the dread of foreign competition. Well, we faced it in the case to which I have referred and we conquered, and I see no reason why we should not face it and conquer in the present instance.

THE EARL OF TANKERVILLE: My Lords, I think we ought to look at this Bill from quite a different standpoint from that from which the noble Lord who represents the Board of Trade appears to regard it. Shipmasters are practically forced to take these deck loads, otherwise they lose their positions; and the noble Lord who moved the Second Reading of this Bill has quoted the case of an officer writing home before starting on the voyage, expressing his fear that he would not reach the other side. The case of the Spanish ship "Vesper" has not been alluded to this afternoon. That case was tried last Friday, and resulted in judgment for £40 and costs. The offence took place on April 6th, and that vessel since that time has made two round trips. One would like to know why the Board of Trade put off trying that case for so long, and whether they proceeded with it because this Bill was coming up. I think, my Lords, the case of the poor man who risks his life on our merchant ships should be listened to, the more so as he is a man who has served his country well. We employed, I believe, 600 ships of the mercantile marine during the Boer War. They carried 1,250,000 tons of food, not including forage; they carried many thousands of horses and mules, and 500,000 men without the loss of a single life. Not only have they served us well in the past, but the officers and men of the merchant service will be the men who, in the event of war, will be drawn upon for the Naval Reserve. Surely, therefor, it is worth the country's while to pay some attention to the appeal which these men now put forward to have their case considered from the point of view of the seaman rather than from that of the owner, whose only fear is for his pocket.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of LANSDOWNE): My Lords, I desire to say one word only with reference to what fell from the noble Duke behind me. I did not understand my noble friend who represents the Board of Trade to argue that this Bill should be refused a Second Reading merely because it had the effect of imposing restrictions upon British shipping which did not apply to the shipping of foreign nations. Where the safety of human beings or, indeed, where the welfare of human beings, is at issue, I conceive that we should never shrink from taking the precautions which humanity demands merely because the effect of those precautions would be to throw some disability or disadvantage upon the persons upon whom we impose them. But what I did understand my noble friend to suggest was this, that the number of casualties arising from the careless use of these deck loads was showing a steady and satisfactory diminution, and, that being the case, and as there are already under the existing law restrictions applicable to British and foreign ships alike, which are, we believe, operating in a satisfactory manner, my noble friend suggested that it was desirable not to impose a new restriction which would certainly operate exclusively in regard to British shipping, and therefore place the shipping interest, which is, as we all know, competing with great difficulty against the shipping of other countries, at a fresh disadvantage. That, I think, is the argument upon which we relied, and I hope that the noble Duke will not suspect us of being at all callous in the matter of risk of life and safety at sea.

LORD KELVIN: My Lords, I think existing legislation is ample proof that our Legislature cannot be accused of callousness in respect to safety of life at sea. We are doing at present not quite all, but nearly all we can in respect to deck cargoes. We allow no ship, British or foreign, to come into a British port with a deck load of wood during the times for which such a cargo is judged inadmissible in respect to safety. We have power over ships coming into our ports, whether they are foreign ships or British ships, and we use that power against both alike. We have power over British ships over the whole sea. We have power over ships loading under the British flag in foreign ports, and it seems to me it would be only consistent with the principles upon which the existing beneficent legislation is founded, that we should not allow British ships—ships under our own control — to take a dangerous deck load during the winter months. To put a deck load on a ship in an American port which has to cross the Atlantic is to court danger. It seems to me that we are bound by the very principles of our present legislation to adopt the provisions of the Bill now before your Lordships' House, and not allow British ships under any circumstances whatever to ship a dangerous deck cargo during the winter months. I hope the House will give this Bill a Second Reading. I hope the Government and the Board of Trade will see that it introduces no condition whatever that is inconvenient or unfair to British shipowners, unless we are to regard all British legislation unfair which, whether it affects shipowners or manufacturers, places upon British subjects liabilities that foreigners are not subject to. I trust that the Board of Trade will see their way to accept the Bill and allow it to be read a second time.

*THE EARL OF WEMYSS: My Lords, I should like to say a word or two on this Bill. I have been asked by the Shipowners' Parliamentary Committee to do my best to oppose it, but, happily, the Government have not seen their way to accept it, and I hope, therefore, your Lordships will not give it a Second Reading. We all feel that it is desirable that risks should be removed as far as possible, but there is another consideration, namely, the question of the trade of the country; and, in the opinion of the shipowners, if this Bill passes, the timber-carrying trade will be absolutely taken away from this country and go into foreign hands. I cannot conceive a greater misfortune to those whom you wish now to benefit by this Bill than that so important a trade as the timber trade should go into foreign hands. I called attention when the fiscal question was under discussion to the fact that the high figure of British freights was very largely due to what foreigners are free from, namely, well-intentioned, but what I think in many cases is short-sighted interference with those who carry on this trade. I remember that at one time something was proposed by the Board of Trade which the shipowners of this country considered so fatal to their interests that they went to the Board of Trade and told them simply this, that if such a measure was passed they would remove their ships from the British flag and place them under the Norwegian or Spanish or other foreign flag. Therefore, in these matters it it is all very well to give way to one's natural feelings, but there are more serious considerations, and very often when you are trying to do good it turns out to be short-sighted philanthropy, for you do more harm to those you are intending to benefit than good. I hope the Second Reading of the Bill will not be agreed to.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON: My Lords, it is not often my good fortune to agree with the noble Earl who has just sat down on questions of this sort. Naturally, I should be altogether inclined to sympathise with the object of the Bill which has been brought in by Lord Muskerry. I think its objects are good, and if it were not that it is undesirable to take the steps which he advocates until you have exhausted all other means of arriving at a satisfactory solution of this question, I should have been very much tempted to vote with him. But it does appear to me that it is very desirable, before you adopt a measure of this kind, which might seriously affect British shipping interests, that you should exhaust every effort in your power to induce foreign nations to come into this arrangement. I have some reason for thinking that there is not altogether unwillingness on the part of foreign countries to adopt our principle of legislation, and I cannot vote for the Second Reading of this Bill until the noble Marquess opposite has had the fullest opportunity of inducing foreign countries to adopt our principle in this respect.

LORD MUSKERRY: My Lords, with regard to what has been said by the noble Marquess who has just sat down, I would like to call attention to the fact that the winter is now coming on and that while we are waiting, before adopting preventative measures, for other countries to come into line we are unjustifiably risking a number of lives. When the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs rose, I was overjoyed to hear his first few sentences, for I made sure he was going to support my Bill. The noble Marquess said we should take every care for the safety of life irrespective of anything else. The effect of his observations was that the first object should be the safety and the welfare of seamen. I would point out that this Bill does not alter the existing law except in this one respect—the law says now that it is dangerous to carry these cargoes to England, forbids their being carried, and provides a punishment for infringement, and all that Parliament is asked is to extend this to British vessels going from a foreign port to a port on the Continent. Is not that perfectly consistent? You say that here is a practice which is dangerous, and yet you allow it in cases where the vessel is bound for the Continent. I am compelled to press the Bill to a Second Reading.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS CIRCULATED WITH THE VOTES.

Accident at Works of Messrs. Jos. Cook and Sons—Fencing of Machinery.

MR. TENNANT (Berwickshire): To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been drawn to the death of a workman named Richard Drummond, which took place on Saturday, 11th June, at the works of Messrs. Jos. Cook and Sons, at Washington Station, through his clothes being caught by the shafting of an engine; and whether he has given instructions for the more efficient fencing of this shafting.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Akers-Douglas.) My attention had not been drawn to this case, and I do not gather from the Question that the accident, though most regrettable, possessed any exceptional features. I have no doubt that the inspector, in the ordinary course, on receiving the report of the accident, inquired into the circumstances and took such steps with regard to the fencing of the machinery or otherwise as were necessary. I will call for a report and verify this.

French Government and North Sea Fisheries Investigation.

MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty): To ask the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, seeing that the Government of Sweden were unable in 1899 to induce the French Government to participate in the North Sea Fisheries Investigation, will the British Government consider the expediency of inviting the French Government to take part in the scheme, especially in view of the fact that France equally with other countries will benefit through any information in regard to fish habits that may be gained.

(Answered by Earl Percy): We have no reason to suppose the French Government would accept the invitation to participate in the North Sea Investigation at our instance, seeing that they declined when invited by the Stockholm Conference.

Prohibition against Macedonians and Bulgarians Moving to other Parts of European Turkey.

MR. MOON (St. Pancras, N.): To ask the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the prohibition against Macedonian or Bulgarian inhabitants of the three vilayets moving to other parts of European Turkey has now been removed or relaxed, so as to admit of such persons entering Constantinople itself and working there at their usual seasonal occupations.

(Answered by Earl Percy.) The Grand Vizier promised Sir Nicholas O'Conor on the 13th of June that he would issue orders for permission to be granted to enable the refugees who recently returned to Macedonia to circulate freely in search of work, should they desire to do so.

Naval Volunteers—Instructors and Travelling Expenses.

MR. KEARLEY (Devonport): To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether he is aware that, because of their failure to provide a sufficient number of instructors to the Naval Volunteer divisions, the Volunteers themselves are, in several cases, paying coastguardsmen to give the instruction necessary to enable them to earn their capitation grants; and whether, seeing that the Naval Volunteer regulations contain no provision for paying the travelling expenses of the men to and from their rifle ranges or boating grounds, and that a number of the Volunteers are working men upon whom such financial burdens press heavily, the recommendations set forth in paragraph 57 of the Report of the recent Royal Commission on the Militia and Volunteers will apply to the Royal Naval Volunteer Reserve.

(Answered by Mr. Pretyman.) The Admiralty have had the temporary difficulty in regard to instructors for Naval Volunteers brought to their notice; and it is believed that it is now practically overcome. They are not aware that any company of Naval Volunteers is now without an instructor except in the case of one company in the Clyde division, to which a man has been nominated, and his appointment is now under consideration. The Admiralty has approved the grant of an allowance to meet the expense of travelling to boating grounds, gun drill places, and rifle ranges.

Combined Office of Chaplain and Naval Instructor.

MR. LYELL (Dorsetshire, E.): To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty in how many of His Majesty's ships are the appointments of chaplain and naval instructor held by different persons; and whether, in view of the importance of cabin space, the Admiralty will give directions that in future no chaplain shall be appointed who is not qualified to act as naval instructor.

(Answered by Mr. Pretyman.) There are 21 of His Majesty's ships in which the appointments of chaplain and naval instructor are held by different persons, and 27 where the two offices are combined in the same individual. The Admiralty recognise the desirability of utilising the cabin accommodation in sea-going ships to the fullest extent, but as there is considerable difficulty in obtaining the services of chaplains who are also qualified to act as naval instructors, no strict rule can be laid down.

County Boroughs with Populations below 50,000.

SIR EDWARD SASSOON (Hythe): To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he would state the number of existing county boroughs with populations below 50,000 in England and Wales.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Akers-Douglas.) There are nine county boroughs with a population, according to the census of 1901, of less than 50,000.

Railway Companies and the new Signal Alarm.

MR. SLOAN (Belfast, S.): To ask the President of the Board of Trade, if he has called the attention of any railway company to the new signal alarm recently submitted to him; and, if so, with what result.

(Answered by Mr. Gerald Balfour.) Since my reply to the Question on this subject addressed to me by the hon. Member on the 12th of last month,† particulars of several inventions of the character referred to have been submitted to the Board of Trade and their inspecting officers, but I am not aware whether these include the invention which the hon. Member has in mind. I cannot undertake to direct the attention of railway companies to any particular invention.

Rateable Value of Post Office Buildings to be Erected on Christ's Hospital Site.

SIR JOSEPH DIMSDALE (London): To ask the Postmaster-General what action the Department propose to take in regard to the payment of rates in respect of the buildings to be erected on the site of Christ's Hospital, in the parish of Christ's Church, Newgate Street; and whether, seeing that Christ's Hospital was only liable to pay on a supposed rateable value £2,488 (in virtue of an Act of Parliament, 35 Geo. 3, Clause 26), he will agree to have the question of the rateage of the whole site reconsidered, in view of the commercial value of the premises now to be erected by the Post Office upon it.

(Answered by Mr. Victor Cavendish.) When the Post Office buildings are erected and occupied the property will be valued in the same way as other Government property is valued, and a contribution in lieu of rates will be given on that valuation.

Minting of Silver Coinage for Crown Colonies.

MR. BAYLEY (Derbyshire, Chesterfield): To ask the Secretary to the Treasury if the silver coinage used in the Crown Colonies is minted at the Royal Mint; and, if not, where is it minted.

(Answered by Mr. Victor Cavendish.) The silver coinage used in the Crown Colonies is, so far as possible, coined at the Royal Mint; but when circumstances make it necessary to have it coined elsewhere it is minted under the supervision and control of the Royal Mint in this country. Recent coinages have been carried out at the Mint, Birmingham. Bronze for Hong-Kong.

Right to Photograph Raglan Castle.

MR. McKENNA (Monmouthshire, N.): To ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he would consider the expediency of abolishing the charges now made for the right to take photographs of Raglan Castle.

---

† See (4) Debates, cxxxiv., 1155.

(Answered by Mr. Victor Cavendish.) Neither the Treasury nor the First Commissioner of Works has any jurisdiction in the matter, as Raglan Castle is not the property of the Crown.

Beri-Beri in the Port of London.

Colonel LEGGE (St. George's, Hanover Square): To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been called to a statement made by Sir Patrick Manson, in an address delivered at St. George's Hospital on 1st October, 1897, that beri-beri is very common in the Port of London, especially among the lascars, and Sidi boys who in many instances form the bulk of the crews of the large steamers trading to the East; whether he can state how many cases are treated annually at the Seamen's Hospital; and what precautions are taken to prevent the spread of the disease.

(Answered by Mr. Walter Long.) My attention has been drawn to the statement referred to in the Question. I am informed that the number of cases of beri-beri treated annually in the Seamen's Hospital in the ten years ended in 1900 averaged twenty-four. The disease is not regarded by the medical officer of the Port of London as infectious in the ordinary sense, and no special precautions are considered necessary.

Indian Cable Rate.

Sir EDWARD SASSOON: To ask the Secretary of State for India whether, in view of the results achieved and the responsiveness of the traffic consequent on the last reduction of the Indian cable rate, he will assist the efforts of Lord Curzon for obtaining a further reduction of 2s. a word.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Brodrick.) I should welcome the reduction of the rate to 2s. a word; but, until I am in possession of the figures of the working of the traffic for the financial year 1903–4, which completes the period of three years under the new system, I shall not be in a position to say whether I am entitled to take any action under the agreement with the telegraph companies concerned.

Mr. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.): To ask the Secretary of State for India whether he is aware that the edition of the year 1900 of a publication called the Golden Book of India (purporting to contain an alphabetical list of titled personages in India, published first in 1893), states on its title page that it is published by the publishers to the India Office; and, if so, will he say whether the India Office or other Indian authorities have assisted in its compilation or are answerable to any extent for the accuracy of its contents; and, if not, whether there is any intention on the part of Government to publish in the near future an accurate list of titled personages in India.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Brodrick.) The title page of the book in question shows that it was published by "Sampson Low, Marston, and Company, Limited, Publishers to the India Office." The first words of the author's introduction are "No official authority attaches to this work or to any statement in it." I am not aware of any intention on the part of the Government of India to publish a list of titled personages in India.

Duties of Royal Irish Constabulary at Ballinagore, County Westmeath.

Mr. SULLIVAN (Westmeath, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether any members of the Royal Irish Constabulary stationed at Ballinagore, county Westmeath, are engaged in herding cattle on an evicted farm in that locality; and, if so, whether they are acting in obedience to the directions of their superior officer.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) The police do not act as herds at Ballinagore. They do, however, afford protection to a herd employed on an evicted holding there and to the cattle under his charge.

Earnings of the Burtonport Railway.

Mr. McFADDEN (Donegal, E.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland what was the amount of the gross earnings per mile per week of the Burtonport Railway for the half-years ending 30th September and 31st March last; what was the surplus of the gross earnings of the line on the amount paid the Lough Swilly Railway Company for working same; and in what manner has the surplus been apportioned between the parties entitled thereto.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) In answer to this Question I would refer to the verbal reply given this afternoon by my hon. friend the Financial Secretary to the Treasury to the similar Question of the hon. Member for North Donegal.†

Peace Preservation Act in County Donegal.

Mr. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if his attention has been called to the charge delivered by his honour Judge Cooke to the grand jury at Lifford, county Donegal, whereby he testified to the entire absence of crime throughout the county; and whether, on account of the crimeless condition of the county for years past, he will consider the revocation of The Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act, 1881, at present in force in portions of the county.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) The Government do not consider it desirable to revoke the Proclamation of portions of this county under the provisions of the Act mentioned.

Fair Rent Applications and Appeals in the Innishowen District.

Mr. O'DOHERTY: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he can state the number of applications for the fixing of fair rents pending hearing by a Sub-Commission Court in the Innishowen district of county Donegal, and the number of appeals from the Sub-Commission and County Court at present pending in said district; when did any Sub-Commission Court sit in the district; and whether, as the majority of the cases have been pending before each tribunal for a number of years, he can say when those concerned may expect their cases disposed of, and if the Appeal Court could arrange to have all Innishowen appeals heard within the district, and not bring, as heretofore, the tenants to Londonderry.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) There are twenty-two applications to fix fair rents pending from the district of Innishowen; seventeen of these appeared on a list the hearing of which was commenced at Stranorlar on the 28th March last, but the actual hearing of these cases has been delayed owing to the illness of the lay Assistant Commissioner for the district. They will, however, be heard at some convenient place in the district, with the remaining cases on the list, at an early date, which will be notified to the parties. Fair rent appeals are pending in only twenty-eight cases from the Innishowen district. A sitting to hear such appeals was last held in June, 1903, when all cases prior to January, 1900, were disposed of. The appeals now pending have all been lodged at various times since that date, and will be listed for hearing on as early a date as possible, having regard to the claims of other places. The Commissioners, however, can give no undertaking to hold their next sitting within that district.

Through Booking of Goods on the Donegal Railway.

Mr. McFADDEN: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Donegal Railway Company, which works the Stranorlar to Glenties line, gave for some years after its opening through bookings of goods, etc., to and from the station at Ballybofry on the latter line; that the working company have discontinued the through bookings to and from Ballybofry for some years past, and at present refuse to book goods, etc., at through rates to and from Ballybofry, and that the result of this stoppage of through bookings to and from Ballybofry Station is that goods for Ballybofry are booked to Stranorlar on the working company's line and then re-booked to Ballybofry from Stranorlar, the distance not being half-a-mile, at an extra cost of 3d. per ton to the consignee; and whether, seeing that the traders of Ballybofry have been in communication with the Board of Works on the subject and desire facilities for through bookings to and from Ballybofry; and, in view of the complaints made to the Board of Works by the traders and merchants of Ballybofry, and of the inconvenience caused to them by the want of through bookings to this station, an inquiry will be directed to be held by the Board of Works into the complaints lodged by the merchants of Ballybofry into the conduct of the Donegal Railway Company in the matter, or such steps taken by the Board of Works as will ensure the removal of the alleged hardship at present suffered by reason of the refusal of the company to grant through bookings of goods, etc., to and from Ballybofry.

(Answered by Mr. Victor Cavendish.) I am informed that the facts are substantially as stated. The Board of Works have communicated with the Donegal Company, and suggested a restoration of the through booking arrangements, but the matter appears to be one which those concerned should bring to the notice of the Department of Agriculture and Technical Instruction.

Arrest of Martin Naughten.

MR. O'MALLEY (Galway, Connemara): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that at a special Court held in Spiddal, on the 13th June, at which a man named Martin Naughten was committed to Galway Gaol on a charge of murder, it was sworn that the prisoner had been arrested by Head Constable Gerrity, although the prisoner had actually been arrested and cautioned by Constable Glynn before the head constable's arrival; and, if so, will he explain why Constable Glynn was not produced at the petty sessions to testify to the circumstances of the arrest.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) Constable Glynn formed one of a party of police acting under Head Constable Gerrity. Constable Glynn discovered the prisoner in hiding, but the head constable charged and cautioned the prisoner. Both policemen were close to each other the entire time. The Crown solicitor did not think it necessary to examine at petty sessions both members of the police force, as the head constable's evidence covered every matter of importance.

City of London Imperial Volunteers—Conditions of Service in South Africa.

SIR JOHN COLOMB (Great Yarmouth): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether, previous to, or during formation, or subsequent to the completion of the Corps of City Imperial Volunteers, any stipulations, agreement, or understanding were entered into by, or on behalf of, any of its members as to where and how the force should be employed in South Africa, whether at the front or otherwise.

Purchase of Army Commissions.

SIR SEYMOUR KING (Hull, Central): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether, before the passing of the Act for the Abolition of Purchase in the Army, officers, on being granted direct commissions in the Army, paid a sum of money to the Government by way of purchase of such commission; whether any of the officers who so obtained their first commissions in the Army were afterwards transferred for service under the Government of India in the Bengal, Bombay, or Madras Staff Corps, now combined in the Indian Army; and whether, on such transfer, the whole or any portion of the sum paid by such officer for his first commission was credited to the Government of India.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Arnold-Forster.) In reply to the first part of the Question, some officers paid for their first commissions and some obtained them without purchase. The payment, however, was not made to the Government but to the officer whose commission was sold. The reply to the second part of the Question is in the affirmative, and to the third part of the Question in the negative.

Police Raid on Kaffir Mine Compounds at Johannesburg.

DR. MACNAMARA (Camberwell, N.): To ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he has any information respecting a police raid within the past few days on the Kaffir mine compounds of East Johannesburg, and the finding of machete knives hidden in the bedding of each Kaffir; and, if not, whether he will make inquiries respecting the matter.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Lyttelton.) I have no information on the subject, but I will make inquiry by despatch.

Coloured Labour in Transvaal Gold Mines.

Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): To ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies if he can state the number of coloured persons employed on the last day of March, April, and May of this year in the Transvaal gold mines, calculated on the same basis as the Return given by him on 26th May last, distinguishing between those in employ and at work.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Lyttelton.)—

Transvaal Gold Mines.

	At work.	In employ.
March, 1904	79,569	73,667
April ,,	78,825	73,246

Channel Fleet and the Tyne.

Mr. RENWICK (Newcastle-on-Tyne): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether, considering that it is many years since the Channel Fleet visited the Tyne, he will endeavour to arrange for it to visit that river during the coming autumn.

*The SECRETARY to the ADMIRALTY (Mr. Pretyman, Suffolk, Woodbridge): The autumn programme of movements for His Majesty's ships in home waters has not yet been arranged, but the feasibility of acting on the hon. Member's proposal for a visit to be paid to the Tyne will be duly considered when making out the programme.

Drafts for India.

Captain NORTON (Newington, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he can state the regiments, batteries, and battalions proceeding to India during the next trooping season, also those regiments, batteries, and battalions which will be called upon to furnish drafts.

*The SECRETARY of STATE for WAR (Mr. Arnold-Forster, Belfast, W.): The following regiments, batteries, and battalions will proceed to India during the next trooping season:—

13th Hussars.

19th, 20th, and 28th batteries of Field Artillery.

62nd, 64th, 77th, and 81st Companies of Garrison Artillery.

1st battalion Royal Irish Regiment.

1st battalion Highland Light Infantry.

1st battalion Manchester Regiment.

As regards drafts every regiment, battery, and battalion in India or the Colonies will require them during the next trooping season, and in the case of cavalry and artillery the drafts will be found from their groups, and in the case of infantry from their linked battalions.

4th Battalion North Staffordshire Militia accident to Private Hill.

Mr. COGHILL (Stoke-upon-Trent): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he has had any report furnished to him as to the circumstances under which William Hill, of Fenton, a private in the 4th battalion North Staffordshire Militia, was shot at Lichfield last week; and what step he proposes to take to prevent similar accidents occurring in the future, by keeping ball cartridges separate from the dummies supplied for musketry drills.

*Mr. ARNOLD-FORSTER: No report of this matter has reached the War Office. I am inquiring into the matter.

Sandhurst Examination Fees.

Sir CARNE RASCH (Essex, Chelmsford): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether a sum of £3, with an additional charge of £1, is imposed on every candidate for Sandhurst previous to the examination; what is the object of this impost; and who receives the money.

*Mr. ARNOLD-FORSTER: The fee for such examination in London is £2 and at any other centre £3. This fee is fixed by the Civil Service Commissioners under Order in Council. The object of an examination fee is to meet examination expenses. The money is paid to the Inland Revenue through the medium of stamps and is paid subsequently into the Exchequer.

Re-armament of the Artillery.

*Sir CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War what number of new guns will be completed for India in the present financial year, and whether that will represent the entire number required; what number it is proposed to complete for the British Army in the next financial year, and at what cost; and what number will remain to be completed, and at what cost, in the financial year ending 31st March, 1907, when nearly the whole re-armament, together with a large number of reserve batteries, are to be finished.

*Mr. ARNOLD-FORSTER: Twenty-one batteries will be completed for India in the present year, this being the number demanded by the Indian Government. It is not possible to state at present what their future demands will be. It is at present contemplated that fifty-four batteries will be completed for the British Army in the next financial year at a cost of £1,300,000. Seventy-six batteries will then remain to be completed for the British Army in the financial year ending 31st March, 1907, at a cost of £1,850,000, of which sum £550,000 would not be paid until 1907–8.

South Africa—Alleged Conspiracy to Murder Lord Milner.

Mr. LLOYD MORGAN (Carmarthen, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he is yet in a position to inform the House as to whether three men have been arrested in the Transvaal on a charge of conspiracy to murder Lord Milner, or any such charge, and whether one of them has been already deported by the police; and, if so, can he state whether the one so deported is a British subject, and, if so, upon what grounds and by what law he was deported; and whether it is intended to bring the others to trial.

The SECRETARY of STATE for the COLONIES (Mr. Lyttelton, Warwick and Leamington): I have not yet received any information from Lord Milner on the subject. I will inquire by despatch.

Beri-Beri in South Africa.

Dr. HUTCHINSON (Sussex, Rye): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, in view of the fact that the beri-beri outbreak was first reported in this country more than a week ago, he can explain the causes of delay in receiving news from South Africa, and now give the House full information on the subject.

Mr. LYTTELTON: I gave the House yesterday all the information which I have so far received on the subject. The contents of the telegram from Lord Milner which I read yesterday appear to me to show that Lord Milner and his medical advisers do not regard the occurrence of this not uncommon disease as involving any very special difficulty. This accounts for his not having treated the matter as one demanding urgent communication home.

Mr. CORRIE GRANT (Warwickshire, Rugby): Has the right hon. Gentleman received from Lord Milner any explanation of his failure to answer the cable?

Mr. LYTTELTON: I have answered that Question.

Trading Rights of British Indians in the Transvaal.

Sir MANCHERJEE BHOWNAGGREE (Bethnal Green, N.E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies what reply he has received to the explanation called for from Sir Arthur Lawley regarding the statement made by him, on the 18th May last, that the decision of the Supreme Court of the Transvaal, confirming the trading rights of British-Indian subjects there, will not be tolerated; whether the reply explains why Sir Arthur Lawley made such a statement without the knowledge or sanction of the Secretary of State or Lord Milner; and will he place the Papers relating to this subject on the Table of the House.

MR. LYTTELTON: I have now before me a verbatim report of Sir A. Lawley's speech on this occasion, which I will send to my hon. friend. He will find that he has been misinformed as to its contents, and that the statement attributed to Sir A. Lawley was never made.

Suicide of British-Indians in Natal.

SIR MANCHERJEE BHOWNAGGREE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies if his attention has been drawn to the statement in the Annual Report for 1903 of the Protector of Indian Immigrants in Natal that there had occurred in that year no fewer than thirty-one cases of suicide, being at the rate of 741 per 1,000,000; if he is aware that eight of these cases occurred among the free Indian community numbering 51,259, whereas twenty-three were those of the indentured class numbering 30,131, showing that the indentured labourers committed suicide in an overwhelmingly large proportion; and, if so, can he say whether the local authorities have been able to trace the causes to which this voluntary destruction of life is due; and, if not, will he at once order an inquiry to be made by an independent Commission into the matter.

MR. LYTTELTON: I have seen the Report referred to. The rate per 1,000,000 among Indians generally appears to be, from the figures given, 382 per 1,000,000 and not 741 as stated in the Question, the rate among free Indians and indentured Indians being 157 and 766 respectively. The Report states: A magisterial inquiry is made into the circumstances attending each case of suicide, and whenever the evidence tends to show that the fatality in any way resulted from ill-treatment received from an employer or employé, I make a personal visit to the estate and inquire myself into the circumstances. In one instance, and one only, did the evidence tend in this direction, but my own inquiry did not confirm this suspicion. Generally speaking witnesses state that they can give no reason for the suicide, and, if those who are supposed to know decline to give any information, it is impossible in many cases to arrive at even a probable cause. I may say that the general rate among Natal Indians in 1902 appears to have been 333, and in 1901 383, so that the rate for the year 1903 is not altogether exceptional. This rate has been exceeded in Paris. I am not at present able to compare the rate with that which obtains among Asiatic races generally, and I understand that there are no returns of suicide in India. In any case I do not see that on the facts there is any ground for taking the unusual course suggested by the hon. Member.

Expenditure of Maltese Government Department of Charitable Institutions.

MR. BOLAND (Kerry, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he can state the total annual expenditure by the Maltese Government Department of Charitable Institutions, including hospitals; how much of this is contributed by the War Office and by the Admiralty respectively; are the military and naval hospitals open to civilians; has he considered the advisability of placing all the hospitals under one central authority; and, if not, will he consider the advisability of placing the civil charitable institutions under the control of a Maltese local government board elected by the taxpayers who support these institutions.

MR. LYTTELTON: The total expenditure of the Maltese Government Department of Charitable Institutions, including hospitals, is estimated in the Colonial Estimates for 1904-5 at £56,337,14,10. None of this expenditure is contributed by the War Office or the Admiralty. The military and naval hospitals are not under ordinary circumstances open to civilians. I have not had under my consideration the questions referred to in the last part of the hon. Member's Question, and I am not aware of any sufficient reasons for modifying existing arrangements.

MR BOLAND: As neither the War Office nor the Admiralty make any contributions to this expenditure, will the right hon. Gentleman consider the advisability of allowing the people of Malta to look after their own hospitals for which they pay?

Northern Nigeria—Finance.

Mr. LOUGH (Islington, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies what is the explanation of the increase in the ordinary expenditure of Northern Nigeria from £62,579 in 1900–1901 to £482,889 in 1903–4; what proportion of this expenditure is for armed forces and what is the nature and object of any military expeditions that are now going on; and whether, in view of the amount of the local revenue and of the commerce of the country, and of the fact that the expenditure of last year has been met by a contribution of £50,000 from Southern Nigeria and a Parliamentary grant of £405,000, he can see his way to undertake that immediate efforts will be made to reduce this outlay.

Mr. LYTTELTON: The ordinary expenditure of Northern Nigeria in 1903–4 is estimated at £382,889, not £482,889. As shown in the statement presented to Parliament (Cd. 2101) the expenditure of £62,579 in 1900–1 does not include expenditure amounting to £145,400 on the West African Frontier Force in that year. The expenditure on the Force in 1903–4 is estimated at £167,591 out of the total of £382,889, leaving £215,398 as the estimated ordinary civil expenditure. The reasons for the increase of expenditure are explained in Sir Frederick Lugard's Annual Reports which have been presented to Parliament. No military expeditions are now going on. The local revenue, though expanding, is still very small. No unnecessary expenditure is incurred. It is hoped that the increase of local revenue may admit of a reduction in the grant-in-aid from Imperial funds in future; but no undertaking in the sense suggested by the hon. Member can be given.

Administration of Panna.

Mr. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.); I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether he has any objection to let the House know the date and purport of the original and specific Report or communication which induced His Excellency the Governor-General of India in Council, after obtaining the concurrence of the Secretary of State for India, to assume the administration of the Principality of Panna, in Central India, in September, 1901, and to suspend the then Ruling Chief of that State; and, if he has any reasons for refusing to publish such Report or communication, will he state what they are.

The SECRETARY of STATE for INDIA (Mr. Brodrick, Surrey, Guildford): The circumstances of the death of the uncle of the late Maharaja of Panna, on the 25th June, 1901, were such that the Agent to the Governor-General ordered the Political Agent to hold a local inquiry without delay. The result of the inquiry was to establish that the deceased had died by poison, and to implicate the then Maharaja in the crime. The report was submitted to the Government of India on the 19th August, 1901, who, on the 1st September, issued the orders referred to by the hon. Member. The views of the Government of India, and the action taken by them on the findings of the Special Commission which was subsequently appointed to investigate the charges judicially, were published in the Gazette of India, in a Resolution dated the 21st April, 1902. As to presenting Papers, I agree with the late Secretary of State in declining to do so. It would not be in the interest of the State itself to publish the details. The facts are sufficiently stated in the Resolution published in the Gazette of India.

Indian Statistical Department.

*Sir MANCHERJEE BHOWNAGGREE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India if there is a separate department or any special provision for the compilation of statistics in India; and, if so, what is the annual amount expended on the work.

Mr. BRODRICK: For the compilation of Indian statistics the Government of India maintains a special department; that of the Director-General of Statistics, and the amount expended on this department in the year 1902–3, the last year for which the returns have been made up, is £6,040. These charges are in addition to those incurred on various establishments for gazetteer and statistical memoirs, railway and river traffic statistics, and provincial statistics; the charges for these in the year 1902–3 amounted to £23,629.

*Sir MANCHERJEE BHOWNAGGREE: Then may I ask my right hon. friend if it is beyond the capacity of a department maintained at so much expense to give the Return regarding labourers in plantations and mines which I asked for on the 14th June?

Mr. BRODRICK: I stated at the time the reasons which in my opinion made it undesirable to do so.

British East Africa.

Mr. BAYLEY (Derbyshire, Chesterfield): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, before granting a charter to any syndicate to control territory in British East Africa, he will lay upon the Table of the House the terms of the proposed grant; and if, before the grant is confirmed by the Foreign Office, an opportunity will be given for the opinion of the House to be taken on the matter; and whether the Government can transfer British territory to a syndicate without the consent of Parliament.

The UNDER-SECRETARY of STATE for FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Earl Percy, Kensington, S.): It is not proposed to grant to any syndicate a charter enabling them to control territory in British East Africa.

Foreign Sailors on British Ships—The "Southern Cross."

Mr. NANNETTI (Dublin, College Green): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he is aware that Messrs. Houlder Brothers, shipowners, and owners of the ss. "Southern Cross," have employed a man named Bethel at Antwerp to engage and supply 35 sailors and firemen for the steamer "Southern Cross," which is at present lying in the port of the Tyne; and, if so, whether he can state the nationality of those seamen, if they are able to speak the English language, and the wages these men are to receive per month; and whether, in view of the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act with regard to the engagement and supply of crews to British ships by persons not licensed by the Board of Trade, he intends to take any action in the matter; and whether he is aware that there is a large number of sailors and firemen unemployed at the Tyne ports.

The PRESIDENT of the BOARD of TRADE (Mr. Gerald Balfour, Leeds, Central): From the inquiries which I have caused to be made it appears that twenty-eight seamen were engaged at the Consulate General at Antwerp to serve on the "Southern Cross," but it is not clear that Bethel was concerned in the supply of the men. Of the twenty-eight men engaged I understand that six were Germans, one an Austrian, one belonged to the United States, three were Dutch, one Danish, two Swedish, two French, three Greek, seven Belgian, one Italian, and one Spanish. It is reported that they had a fair knowledge of English, and all but three produced certificates of discharge showing service in British vessels. The wages of the eight A.B's were £3 5s., a month, of the eighteen firemen £3 15s., and of the two deck boys £1 a month. Upon the information before me I doubt whether the engagement of the men at Antwerp constitutes an infringement of the provisions of Section 111 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, but the Board of Trade are being legally advised upon the point.

Mr. NANNETTI: And could not sailors have been obtained at the port from whence the vessel sailed?

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: I have no reason to think they could not.

Licensing Bill.

Mr. CATHCART WASON (Orkney and Shetland): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will state approximately the value of the licensed premises to which the Bill before the House applies; the maximum capitalised amount that could be raised by quarter sessions for the purpose of closing specified licensed premises; the approximate extra value that would be given to the licensed premises remaining by the decreased contribution and by the absolute fixity of tenure secured for a long period.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. AKERS-DOUGLAS, Kent, St. Augustine's): I find it extremely difficult to understand the precise meaning of the various parts of the Question: but, so far as I can see, it is impossible to produce any useful figures such as the hon. Member appears to desire.

Swine Fever Regulations in Aberdeenshire.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I beg to ask the hon. Member for North Huntingdonshire, as representing the Board of Agriculture, whether he is aware that while there is no swine fever in the North of Scotland, the Board of Agriculture has brought pressure to bear on the local authorities of the city and county of Aberdeen and counties of Banff and Kincardine to pass a swine fever order, forbidding the movement of swine into or out of their districts except under restrictions, and that these local authorities have, under pressure from the Board, passed such orders; and, if so, will he state the necessity for such orders; and whether, in view of their effect upon the swine trade in these districts, steps will be taken for their reconsideration.

MR. AILWYN FELLOWES (Huntingdonshire, Ramsey): The regulations referred to by the hon. Member were adopted by the local authority on the suggestion of the Board, and they have for their object the protection of the county against the introduction of infection from outside. They do not impose restrictions upon the movement of swine out of the district, and are on the lines of those which in many parts of Great Britain have been found by experience to combine a minimum of restraint upon trade with a maximum of effectiveness against disease. Indeed, it is to their general adoption that the present improved position with regard to swine fever must be largely attributed. The necessity for some such local protective measures, especially in counties themselves free from infection, is well shown by the case of another Scotch county—Ayrshire—where in the absence of efficient regulations no fewer than forty-nine outbreaks of swine fever have recently occurred owing to the introduction of a consignment of swine from England. There is no objection on our part to counties with a clean bill of health combining together to adopt the same regulations and so widening the area in which free movement is allowed. An arrangement of this character will, we understand, be adopted by Aberdeenshire and the adjoining counties.

Licence Fees in North Ireland.

MR. JOSEPH DEVLIN (Kilkenny, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the amount received annually by the clerk of the peace for the city of Belfast for the registration of the 649 licences to sell beer and spirits in that city amounts to £81 2s. 6d., or since 1874 £2,433 15s., which first-named sum is made up by his charging a fee of 2s. 6d. for each licence; and whether he will state the purpose to which these fees are devoted.

I beg also to ask Mr. Attorney-General for Ireland whether he is aware that the clerks of the peace for the county of Antrim and the city of Belfast are in receipt of a fee on the annual renewal of a publican's licence; and, if so, under what statute are such fees authorised; and whether, under the provisions of Section 17 of the Act of 1874 the payment of any fees whatever in respect to renewal of a licence to sell spirits or beer is prohibited.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. ATKINSON, Londonderry, N.): I believe the average annual sum received in respect of fees on licences by the clerk of the peace for Belfast in recent years amounts to about £81. I am unable to ascertain what the fees amounted to so far back as 1874. These fees are, under the provisions of the 10th Section of the Licensing Act of 1833, as amended by the 15th Section of the Licensing Act of 1874, received and retained by him as part of the emoluments of his office and especially in respect of his labour in keeping a register of licensed traders. Section 17 of the Act of 1874 deals with an entirely different matter, namely, the fee paid to the petty sessions clerk on the granting by the justices of their certificates. When the offices of Clerk of Peace and Crown are amalgamated the former fees are retained by the revenue officer and paid into the Treasury under the 16th Section of the Revenue Act of 1898.

Dublin Metropolitan Police—Constable Whyte's Case.

MR. SLOAN (Belfast, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will explain why twenty-seven constables of the Dublin Metropolitan Police have been promoted to the rank of sergeant over the head of Constable T. Whyte, who was their senior and qualified for promotion.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. WYNDHAM, Dover): I am informed that this constable was not promoted because he was not considered to be properly qualified for the rank of sergeant. Seniority is an element, but not the determining element, in considering a man's fitness for promotion.

MR. JOSEPH DEVLIN: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will consider the advisability of promoting Constable Whyte to the Custom House Steps staff.

Irish Evicted Tenants—Case of A. P. Doolan, of Shinrone, King's County.

MR. REDDY (King's County, Birr): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been directed to the case of Amos Palmer Doolan, who was evicted from his farm at Derry MacEdmund, near Shinrone, King's county, his yearly rent being £142; whether he is aware that the agent became tenant of the evicted holding on the 25th September, 1903, at the yearly rent of £72; and, if so, can he state when Doolan made application to the Estates Commissioners for reinstatement, and with what result; and whether, seeing that the landlord, J. H. Lloyd, has agreed to sell this estate to the occupying tenants, the Estates Commissioners, before sanctioning advances for purchase, will fully investigate the facts and take into consideration Doolan's claims.

MR. WYNDHAM: This property has not yet come before the Estates Commissioners. The evicted tenant named in the Question has applied for reinstatement, and his application will be duly considered.

MR. KILBRIDE (Kildare, S.): Is it the case that the agent of the estate now occupies the farm?

MR. WYNDHAM: I believe that is so.

Ballingeary Police Force.

MR. SHEEHAN (Cork County, Mid): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will state the number of police at present stationed at Ballingeary; and, seeing that there were only eleven cases from the village tried at petty sessions during the past year, will he explain what necessity now exists for the continuance of this police barrack; and whether the peace of the district could not be efficiently protected from the other barrack in the parish.

MR. WYNDHAM: A sergeant and four constables. The question of the necessity for the continuance of the barrack is one for determination by the authorities locally responsible for the maintenance of the public peace. These authorities do not consider the barrack can be dispensed with at present.

Land Purchase in County Kerry—Alleged Arbitrary Action of Landlords.

MR. MURPHY (Kerry, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that on the estate of Mr. G. A. G. Hickson, of Gortullea, county Kerry, who is a middleman under Trinity College, the tenants have been proceeded against for rent at quarter sessions because they refused to agree to the terms of purchase stated by the agent, and that the amount proceeded for includes the hanging gale, which has never hitherto been demanded; and, if so, whether he can do anything to protect these tenants, pending the decision of the Vice-regal Commission appointed to inquire into such cases.

The following Questions also appeared on the Paper:—

MR. MURPHY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Receiver under the Land Judge on the M'Cartie Estate, in the county of Kerry, on 22nd June, 1904, issued a letter to the tenants stating that the estate would not be sold for eighteen and a-half years purchase, and that an order had been made to proceed against the tenants; and, if so, will he state whether the Estates Commissioners are negotiating for the purchase of these estates; and, if not, what steps he proposes to prevent such methods of forcing these tenants into unreasonable bargains.

MR. THOMAS O'DONNELL (Kerry, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the tenants on the estate of Mr. F. R. Bateman, Tralee, have paid, from 10th March, 1903, to 18th January, 1904, three gales rent, and have now been prosecuted for a fourth gale within a twelvemonth, and that these proceedings have been instituted for the purpose of forcing the tenants to accept the terms of purchase which Mr. Bateman is demanding; and whether any legislative steps will be taken to protect tenants from such exercise of their powers on the part of landlords.

MR. WYNDHAM: This is one of three Questions falling within the same category to which it will be more convenient for me to reply together. I have no official information respecting the matters of fact alleged in the first and third Questions. With respect to the first part of the second Question the Registrar of the Land Judge's Court is not aware whether a letter was issued by the Receiver to the tenants in the terms stated. It is the fact, however, that the Land Judge recently made an Order giving the Receiver liberty to proceed for recovery of the rents on the McCartie Estate, which the tenants were withholding. On the general question I have to observe that the Land Purchase Act does not abolish any rights, either of tenants or landlords, in respect of the payment of rent. Legislation to affect these rights would, in my opinion, be most prejudicial to the successful working of land purchase on the lines laid down by the Land Conference. The hon. Members who put these Questions seem to suggest that a landlord should be debarred from suing for money owed to him pending a sale. The obvious objections to such a course must be apparent, if they will consider the opposite case of a number of tenants asking for a reduction on rent pending a sale. Section 13 of the Act of 1881 amply protects tenants from oppressive proceedings for recovery of rent, and Section 10 of the Purchase of Land Act, 1885, confers on the Land Commission all the powers of a Court of Equity to rescind contracts into which one of the parties has been by duress forced to enter. In addition to these protections, under the Purchase Act of 1903 an inspection in respect of security is obligatory in the cases of all holdings other than those specified in Section 1, i.e., judicial rents inside the zones.

MR. THOMAS O'DONNELL: Arising out of the reply of the right hon. Gentleman, may I ask him if it is not a fact that under the Act of last year sales should be voluntary, and whether in this case the landlord is not now using powers he never possessed before in order to induce the tenants to buy?

MR. WYNDHAM: The hon. Member has not quite seen the purport of my reply. If tenants came in in a batch and said, "We want a reduction of 20 per cent.," that may be described as bringing pressure to bear, but it is far better they should come together amicably.

MR. FLAVIN (Kerry, N.): The right hon. Gentleman says the tenants are protected from aggressive proceedings. Is he aware that in this very district landlords have proceeded against the tenants for the recovery of rents not yet due?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! I would suggest to hon. Members interested in the Answer that they should see the written Answer. It relates to legal matters.

MR. THOMAS O'DONNELL: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered that part of my Question asking "whether a certain landlord having been paid three gales rent is now proceeding for a fourth in the same twelvemonth?

MR. WYNDHAM: I did answer that. I said I have no information, and I have no means of information about the particular facts referred to by the hon. Member.

MR. THOMAS O'DONNELL: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman——

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The Question on the Paper has been answered.

Listellick Farm.

MR. THOMAS O'DONNELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Congested Districts Board have taken any steps to purchase the farm recently put up for sale at Listellick, county Kerry.

MR. WYNDHAM: The question of the purchase of this property will probably be considered by the Board at its next Meeting on the 15th July.

Coleraine—Alleged Police Persecution of a Publican.

MR. MACVEAGH (Down, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the conduct of a police constable named Molloy at Coleraine Petty Sessions in a prosecution against a hotel keeper for breach of the licensing laws; whether he is aware that this constable threatened one of the witnesses that whether he would be summoned or not in future would depend on the way he would give his evidence, and that the case was dismissed; and, if so, will he say whether the constable has been censured for his conduct.

MR. WYNDHAM: The constable used no threat. He stated to one of the witnesses that if he told the truth he might not be summoned. This was an improper observation and the constable has been so informed.

MR. MACVEAGH: Will this constable be removed from the district?

MR. THOMAS O'DONNELL: Will the right hon. Gentleman take steps to put an end to this systematic persecution of this publican, which has become a matter of public notoriety?

Irish Veterinary Department—Catholic Official's Salaries.

MR. JOSEPH DEVLIN: On behalf of the hon. Member for East Mayo, I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, whether he can state what substantial advantages have been received by the Catholic officials of the Veterinary Branch of the Agricultural Department in addition to pension rights; whether the new arrangement carries with it any reduction in salaries; whether he is aware that these officials on their present scale of increment would have served thirteen years before receiving salaries of £2 a week, and that the pension after twenty-six years service and upwards would be only 15s. a week; and whether any effort will be made to improve their position.

MR. WYNDHAM: The Question presumably refers to some temporary clerks who were employed at weekly rates of pay before they were placed on the permanent establishment of the Department. In addition to pension rights they obtained the advantage of a more secure position, annual increments of salary, and sick leave privileges on full pay. As temporary clerks they were paid at the rate of 35s. a week, which is equivalent to £91 a year; on promotion they were paid an initial salary of £90. A salary of over £2 a week will be reached after six years established service; had they remained on a temporary footing their remuneration would have continued stationary at 35s. a week. No question of religion enters into Departmental promotions, and the Department is at all times ready to consider the claims of its officers for advancement when opportunity arises.

Wicklow Camp Canteen Licence.

MR. JAMES O'CONNOR (Wicklow, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Lord Chancellor of Ireland has considered the action of Mr. James Shanks in signing a licence certificate for a canteen situated in the county Wicklow, Mr. Shanks not being a magistrate for that county, and the local magistrates having refused to grant the licence on the ground that the canteen had been conducted in a disorderly manner; and whether he can now state what decision the Lord Chancellor has come to in regard to Mr. Shanks' action.

Mr. WYNDHAM: No decision has yet been come to. The Lord Chancellor is in correspondence with Mr. Shanks in the matter.

Kerry Parish Committees—Management Rules.

Mr. THOMAS O'DONNELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will explain why the rules regulating the management of parish committees in Kerry have not been published; whether, under those rules, a district councillor who is a shopkeeper, or resides in a shopkeeper's house, or is a relative of a shopkeeper, is not allowed to act on the committee, and, if so, for what reason; whether he will explain the meaning of the word "shopkeeper" and state what classes of men it includes; whether landlords and their agents to whom the small landowners, for whom the scheme is meant, owe arrears of rent are allowed to be members of the committee; and, if so, will he state what is the cause of this difference of treatment.

Mr. FLAVIN: At the same time may I ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the scheme for parish committees in Kerry is being blocked by the rule debarring district councillors who are shopkeepers from serving on the committees; and whether, in the interest of this scheme, he will at once withdraw this rule.

Mr. WYNDHAM: The rules have been freely supplied to persons locally interested, to members of the committees and to all other persons who have made application for them to the office of the Congested Districts Board. The rule prohibiting a shopkeeper, or a member of his household, from membership of a committee was adopted in the interests of the impartial administration of grants by the committee, the Board being of opinion that persons interested in the sale of materials or goods should not be eligible for membership of a body entrusted with the duty of dealing with applications for grants to enable them to purchase materials or goods. Resident landlords and agents are eligible for membership. They have no direct interest in the sale of materials. The rule in question has hitherto worked satisfactorily and it is not proposed to withdraw it.

Mr. THOMAS O'DONNELL asked if it were the fact that the rules were not followed and if, under the circumstances, the right hon. Gentleman would not withdraw them.

Mr. WYNDHAM replied suggesting that that was unreasonable as the rules were in operation in other parts of Ireland.

Phœnix Park, Dublin.

Mr. THOMAS O'DONNELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will state by whose authority the most convenient parts of the Phœnix Park, Dublin, are railed off and preserved for polo and cricket; and whether, seeing that the Phœnix Park is a public park belonging to the citizens of Dublin, he will explain why the members of Sluagh na Heireann, most of whom are school boys, are prevented from playing native games in the Nine Acres; and whether he will consider the advisability of requiring the members of the polo club to go out to the Fifteen Acres.

Mr. WYNDHAM: The duties and powers of the Commissioners of Public Works in respect to the Phœnix Park are conferred by the Statute 23 and 24 Vict. cap. 42. The park is a Royal park and is the property of the Crown. With respect to the remainder of the Question, the hon. Member's attention does not appear to have been directed to my reply to the similar Question on the 16th instant of the hon. Member for the College Green Division.†

Mr. THOMAS O'DONNELL: Am I to understand from the Answer of the right hon. Gentleman that the Phœnix Park in Dublin is under the control of the Board of Works by statute and is not belonging to the people of Dublin?

Mr. WYNDHAM: I believe that is so. At the same time the citizens in no part of Ireland enjoy so much liberty as those in Dublin.

Development of Small Industries in Ireland.

MR. J. F. X. O'BRIEN (Cork): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether, with a view to arousing a spirit of enterprise in Ireland, he will consider the desirability of putting before the people such object-lessons as a number of small industries in successful operation in various districts; whether he will consider the best means for organising such small industries through the agency of the Agricultural Department; and whether he will take steps to utilise the acquirements of the children about to be trained in technical schools when fit for work, in order to check emigration.

MR. WYNDHAM: The Department, acting in co-operation with local authorities or associations, has been engaged, for some time past, in conducting experiments of the character indicated. For example, shirt-making at Dundalk and Sligo; straw hat making at Wexford; furniture at Athlone; and hosiery at New Ross, Carlow, and Cavan, Experiments of a similar character at Bandon and Clonmel are at present under consideration.

Enlargement of Kilclooney Burial Ground.

MR. ROCHE (Galway, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state at what price per acre the Congested Districts Board purchased the Kilclooney property, and what sum per acre the Board is asking from the Tuam District Council for the land required to enlarge the Kilclooney burial ground.

MR. WYNDHAM: The average price of the Kilclooney property was £19 per statute acre, but the best land on the estate, such as that to be sold to the Tuam District Council, is estimated to have cost the Board £45 per statute acre.

Blakeney Estate, County Galway.

MR. ROCHE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state if the Blakeney Estate, Abbert, county Galway, is in the Land Judge's Court; if so, for how long; whether he can state the name of the agent or receiver; whether he has been instructed to take advantage of the Land Purchase Act; and whether he will be directed to supply to the tenants any necessary information to enable them to make an offer for the property.

MR. WYNDHAM: The position of this estate is being investigated, and I will ask the hon. Member to postpone the Question till Tuesday next.

Clanricarde Tenants and Sporting Rights.

MR. ROCHE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that five of the Clanricarde tenants at Derrygoolan, Woodford, have been served with notices to quit in consequence of their asserting their right to the game on their lands; and whether he will take steps to ensure that the police shall not be allowed in the future to accompany poachers on the lands, seeing that such proceedings may intimidate the tenants.

MR. WYNDHAM: This is a case in which two parties assert a right to one and the same incorporeal hereditament, i.e., the shooting. It is for them to prove such rights by due course of law. It is for the police to prevent a breach of the peace. The hon. Member describes one of the parties as "poachers," but that involves the decision of the very matter in dispute.

Rae Estate, Keel, County Kerry.

MR. THOMAS O'DONNELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the tenants on the Rae Estate, Keel, county Kerry, have applied to the Congested Districts Board for the purchase of this estate; whether the beneficial owners have signified their consent to sell; whether the Congested Districts Board have made any offer or taken any steps preliminary to an offer.

MR. WYNDHAM: Such an application has been made by the tenants, and the Board is in correspondence with the owners.

Buncrana and Cardonagh Railway.

Mr. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the traffic accounts of the Buncrana to Cardonagh Railway and the Letterkenny to Burtonport Railway have been settled half-yearly, as provided for by the Orders in Council authorising the construction of said lines; if he can say what has been the gross earnings per mile per week in each half-year of said railways; if not, what has been the cause of delay in settling the accounts; whether the accounts, as furnished by the working company to the Treasury or the Board of Works, have been accepted by them as satisfactory; if not, why have steps not been taken to compel the working company to furnish accurate accounts; and whether he can say what is the available surplus in each available for distribution between the Treasury and the working company after providing for the working expenses.

The FINANCIAL SECRETARY of the TREASURY (Mr. Victor Cavendish, Derbyshire, W.): The accounts of the Burtonport Railway are not made up for the half-years ending 31st March and 30th September, but for half yearly periods ending 30th June and 31st December in each year. The line was opened on 9th March, 1903, and the first accounts were made up to the 30th June following. The last accounts were for the half-year ended 31st December. The amounts of the gross earnings per mile per week for the period ended 30th June, and for the half-year ended 31st December were, respectively, £3 18s. and £3 14s. 10d., as shown in the printed accounts furnished by the Lough Swilly Company. The surplus of the gross earnings over and above the amount retained by the Lough Swilly Company for working the line, after payment of dividends on guaranteed shares, is £3,530 for the ten months referred to, but certain items in the accounts are in dispute between the Board of Works and the company. Meantime, pending a settlement, the surplus has not yet been apportioned.

Mr. O'DOHERTY asked a further Question about working expenses, but—

Mr. VICTOR CAVENDISH said he could add nothing to his Answer.

Enniskillen Post Office—Missing Postal Orders.

Mr. JORDAN (Fermanagh, S.): I beg to ask the Postmaster-General if he is aware that a letter was posted in Lisnaskea, county Fermanagh, on 23rd April, 1903, by a Mr. McBrien, of Carratistune, Derrylin, addressed to the Earl of Enniskillen, Post Office, Enniskillen, containing four postal orders of 20s. each, numbered $\frac{0}{75}$ 848,480, $\frac{0}{75}$ 848,479, $\frac{6}{76}$ 259,191, and $\frac{6}{76}$ 259,192, and that neither letter nor orders reached their destination; and, if so, will he investigate this affair with a view of ascertaining how the orders were finally disposed of, and will he direct that the amount be refunded by the Department to the sender.

The POSTMASTER-GENERAL (Lord Stanley, Lancashire, Westhoughton): Representation was made by Mr. Felix McBrien, of Carratistune, Derrylin, that a letter sent by him on 23rd April, 1903, to the Earl of Enniskillen at the Post Office, Enniskillen, had not been delivered. Search was made, but no trace of any such letter could be found. No postal order for 20s. was issued at the Lisnaskea Post Office on the date in question. The orders quoted were issued there on the 22nd April, and I am satisfied from the inquiries which have been made that they are not the orders which Mr. McBrien states were enclosed in the letter described. In the circumstances there are no grounds on which I should be justified in paying the amount to Mr. McBrien.

Mr. JORDAN: If I furnish the noble Lord with further particulars, with the numbers, and the handwriting of the postmaster, will it influence him to change his mind?

Lord STANLEY: I shall be most happy to look into the question, but I do not say I will change my mind.

Attempted Proselytism in the Cork Post Office.

Mr. J. F. X. O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Postmaster-General whether his attention has been called to the fact that on 22nd June the postmaster of Cork permitted Commander Salwey of His Majesty's Coastguards, Kinsale, to visit the interior of the Cork Post Office, the postmaster himself and the telegraph superintendent accompanying him in his tour of the office, and that Commander Salwey distributed religious tracts among the staff on duty; and, if so, whether, in view of the fact that over 90 per cent. of the said staff are Catholics, he will state how the parties guilty of this conduct shall be dealt with.

LORD STANLEY: From the inquiry which has been made, I find that while Captain Salwey was being shown the telegraph office at Cork he apparently dropped tracts on the tables and on the floor unnoticed by the postmaster or the acting superintendent who were accompanying him. The tracts were not, it appears, of a controversial character; and though I think Captain Salwey's conduct was indiscreet, I do not propose to take any action in the matter.

MR. JOHN REDMOND: Will the right hon. Gentleman see that this malpractice is not pursued in future, seeing that it is most offensive to a large number of employees?

LORD STANLEY: If it had been discovered in time the officials would certainly have stopped it.

MR. J. F. X. O'BRIEN: Will the right hon. Gentleman inquire as to the distribution of leaflets of this kind, and as to whether it was not done in the company of the postmaster of Cork and the superintendent?

LORD STANLEY: I have said that they were present, but they did not see him dropping the leaflets.

MR. CONDON (Tipperary, E.): They winked the other eye.

Birthday Honours List.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury why, in the official announcement of the list of Birthday honours, has that list been intituled the Prime Minister's List; what is the reason for this new departure in the form of the official announcement, and at whose suggestion and on whose responsibility has it been made; and whether there is any, and, if so, what, precedent for the announcement of the list of Birthday honours as the Prime Minister's List.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): There was no official announcement of the kind suggested by the hon. Gentleman. I understand that the list of honours was headed in one newspaper in the way suggested, but that is not the ordinary way, and certainly it had no authority from me.

Irish Board of Agriculture—Sir Horace Plunkett's Position.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the office of Vice-President of the Irish Board of Agriculture is a Ministerial office, held at the pleasure of the Crown, whose tenure depends on the existence of the Government of which the holder is a member; whether he is aware that the statute constituting the office provides that the person appointed thereto will not, if a Member of the House of Commons, vacate his seat, and will not be required to submit himself for re-election under the provisions of the Place Acts; whether, seeing that it is the duty of the Vice-President of the Agricultural Board to explain and expound in Parliament the policy of that Board, and to answer Parliamentary criticism of that policy on behalf of the Government, that since 1900 the Vice-President of this Board has been without a seat in either House of Parliament, and that the Vice-President himself stated shortly after the general election of 1900 that his absence from Parliament for any considerable time was not compatible with the retention of his office, he will say if there is any, and, if so, what, precedent for the holding by a Minister of the Crown for a period of nearly four years of office without a seat in Parliament; and what action, if any, does he propose to take in this matter.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The first Question is whether the Vice-President of the Irish Board of Agriculture would go out if the Ministry went out. The Answer is in the affirmative. Then the hon. Gentleman asks me whether the seat would be vacated in the ordinary way upon taking office. The answer to that is also in the affirmative. The hon. Gentleman asks me whether there is any precedent for any gentleman who holds Parliamentary office under the Crown not having a seat in this House. Yes, there are many precedents. I am informed that in Mr. Gladstone's and Lord Rosebery's Government of 1892–4 the Attorney-General for Ireland was not in this House, and I have no reason to believe that the life of that Government would have been prolonged if he had been in the House. As regards the quotation from the speech of the Vice-President himself, it is true that he thought, and no doubt thinks, that he could perform his duties better if he were able in this House to deal with the questions that arise in connection with his office. I will be quite frank with the House. When the office was first instituted it was undoubtedly the desire of the Government that the Vice-President should be in this House, and I think it would be more convenient that he should be.

Mr. JOHN REDMOND: Why do not you give him a seat?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot state too emphatically that in my opinion the special qualifications of Sir Horace Plunkett for the duties which he carries out—duties which, as I am sure every Member of this House will admit, he has undertaken quite apart from ordinary Party politics—and the single-hearted ability which he has thrown into his duties render his case a special one.

Mr. JOHN REDMOND asked whether, in view of the Prime Minister's high opinion of the services which Sir Horace Plunkett had rendered, and his opinion that he ought to be in that House, the right hon. Gentleman would take steps to have Sir Horace Plunkett selected as the Conservative candidate for one of the vacant seats.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I believe there are parts of the country where the Leader of the Party settles who shall represent a constituency. I have no such desire.

The Licensing Bill.

Mr. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I desire to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, having regard not only to the inconvenience of short notice, but also to the fact that on all previous occasions when propositions of the kind which the right hon. Gentleman is to make to-morrow have been made longer notice has been given, he seriously proposes to take the notice standing in his name to-morrow.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes, Sir, I quite seriously propose it. I do not exactly understand what the right hon. Gentleman's objection is. Of course, if there are difficulties in the way of his marshalling his forces in order to deal with the question, I should sympathise with him. But it is certainly not a question in regard to which elaborate considerations have to be worked out, or on which hon. Gentlemen require time to prepare their speeches.

Mr. BRYCE: As I am challenged on the subject I will tell the right hon. Gentleman why we think longer notice is necessary. It is because we look upon this occasion as one of the utmost gravity and because many Members of the House who have business engagements made long ago will find it very difficult to be present to-morrow. Among them is the Leader of the Opposition, who is absent at this moment. I ask the right hon. Gentleman, considering that the interests of the country and of this House must necessarily be involved in this matter, whether it would not be in accordance with his sense of due respect to the House of Commons to give longer notice.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I think the right hon. Gentleman is labouring under a mistake. I have not refreshed my memory with the degree of notice given with regard to the Home Rule Bill, the Evicted Tenants Bill, the Education Bill, or the other Bills to which this process has been applied; but I certainly do not see why the interval which I have given between yesterday and to-morrow is not sufficient to enable hon. Members to make up their minds on the subject.

Mr. BRYCE: The right hon. Gentleman did not give notice yesterday. The notice only came to the knowledge of Members of the House this morning when the Papers were delivered. With regard to the Education Bill, the right hon. Gentleman gave notice at the end of a Friday sitting and did not take the Motion until the following Tuesday.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Can the right hon. Gentleman also refresh my memory with regard to the Evicted Tenants Bill?

MR. BRYCE: My recollection is that considerable notice was given.

NEW BILLS.

VALUATION (No. 2) BILL.

"To amend the Law to enable the council of every county and county borough to be the sole Valuation Authority of its county or borough for all rateable purposes, and for Income-Tax and Inhabited House Duty," presented by Mr. John Hutton; supported by Sir John Dorington and Colonel Stopford Sackville; to be read a second time upon Monday, 18th July, and to be printed. [Bill 249.]

DRUNKENNESS (IRELAND) BILL.

"To amend the Law relating to Drunkenness in Ireland, and for purposes connected therewith," presented by Mr. Hugh Law; supported by Sir James Haslett, Sir Thomas Esmonde, Mr. T. W. Russell, and Captain Donelan; to be read a second time upon Wednesday next, and to be printed. [Bill 250.]

SUPPLY [14TH APRIL] [15TH ALLOTTED DAY].

Resolution reported.

ARMY ESTIMATES, 1904-5.

"That a sum, not exceeding £2,839,000, be granted to His Majesty, to defray the Charge for the Supply and Repair of Warlike and other Stores, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1905."

Resolution read a second time.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean) moved to reduce the sum by £10,000 in respect of artillery. The re-armament of the artillery with quick-firing guns was a matter which had been already discussed this session. A very large sum of money would be required for the re-armament, of which none was asked for in the present year, and one complaint was that the whole of the cost of the present year was being thrown on the Indian Estimates. It appeared that the Government were now retubing the existing guns and the amount by which he asked that the Vote should be reduced was the minimum cost of the process. The Vote in the Estimates for guns and carriages this year showed a reduction of £500,000 and that for field artillery had also been considerably reduced. This country was to pay a certain proportion of the cost of re-armament next year, but it appeared that the heaviest portion of the cost was to be thrown on the Estimates two years hence. Looking to the fact that this re-armament had been expected for many years, that it had been most actively demanded by the House since 1899, that it had been far too long postponed, and that credit had been taken by the Prime Minister for a re-armament which never, as a fact, took place, it did seem monstrous that the main charge for the re-armament of the artillery should be thrown on the Army Estimates two years hence. It was a most improper proceeding. He noted also that the question of supplying field guns to the Volunteer and Militia artillery was untouched. It had been constantly pointed out to the House that we were behind other Powers in the matter of re-armament of the artillery with quick-firing guns. In the present war between Russia and Japan quick-firing guns had played a most important part, and it had been clearly demonstrated that any army which took the field with guns such as we now had would be lost. Although they were told the manufacturers were to have carte blanche, yet the guns would not be ready for two years. Both Japan and Russia, however, had turned them out with much greater speed, and it seemed to him incredible that this country could not do as well. The sum he moved was intended to cover a large proportion of the cost of the retubing which was going on in this country, which was an attempt to make fit for service guns which were altogether superannuated—guns which no other Power in the world would put into the field.

Amendment proposed—

"To leave out the sum of '£2,839,000,' and to insert the sum of '£2,829,000.'"—(Sir Charles Dilke.)

Question proposed, "That '£2,839,000' stand part of the said Resolution."

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. ARNOLD-FORSTER, Belfast, W.) said he was quite unable to understand the grave nature of the right hon. Gentleman's charge in regard to the expenditure on new guns. It was perfectly true that it was decided by him, in consultation with his right hon. friend the Secretary of State for India, that the expenditure on the new guns this year should, in the main, fall upon India. What was there to criticise in that arrangement? They could only manufacture during the first year a certain number of guns, and where were those guns more likely to be wanted than in India? He had ascertained the output capacity of the firms engaged in the manufacture of guns, and had also taken into account the amount of money available for the purchase of the guns in the current year. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to think that the British Army was in some way worse off because the first guns were to go to India.

SIR CHARLES DILKE said his point that day was that they had put off the main supply until two years hence.

*MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER said they had now sealed the patterns of the horse and field guns, and they had ascertained the number which could be manufactured during the current year; that would amount to twenty-one horse and field batteries. A very considerable amount of work, to the extent of over £100,000, which would contribute towards the completion of the guns in the next year to be appropriated to the Army at home, would also be done. He could not agree with the right hon. Gentleman that they had put off the bulk of the expenditure on these guns till 1907. The right hon. Gentleman had suggested that in other countries the guns were manufactured with greater speed. He had taken great pains to ascertain what had been the exact process of re-armament in every other country which had re-armed, and he did not find that, in proportion to the Army they had to supply, we were acting in any way differently from any other country. They were proposing, and he hoped they would be able, to spend £1,300,000 on these guns during next year. They believed that the rate of manufacture would enable them to turn out a battery a week. He did not regard that as a low rate of manufacture, though he believed that, if they abandoned all their other work, and concentrated entirely on the manufacture of guns, it would be possible to slightly accelerate the out-put. But the question of how they should apportion their work was one which the responsible Department must be allowed to deal with. If they manufactured at the rate of a battery a week during next year, he thought they would be doing a great deal towards accomplishing the end they had in view. Even in the current year the manufacture of the component parts of the guns would be proceeded with. He did not know if the right hon. Gentleman was aware of what an elaborate process preceded the actual manufacture of guns. After the sealed pattern had been received, patterns had to be made not only for the Royal Gun Factories but also for private manufacturers. He was anxious that the guns manufactured this year should proceed as fast as they could, but he did not for a moment anticipate that they would to any extent be in advance of the estimate they had formed. They had made a very strenuous effort to do their duty in this matter. They were arranging for the re-armament of the whole of the horse and field artillery of this country, and the limit of time was far shorter than had ever been the case for such a purpose in the history of the country. He could conceive that a national emergency might arise which would make it desirable that we should be armed more quickly, and perhaps in that event progress might be accelerated. If the right hon. Member for the Forest of Dean could get his Party, who had been greatly in favour of a reduction of our military expenditure, to allow him to expend during the coming year more than £1,300,000, he should certainly thank him for the assistance he had given and would expend the money. He would remind hon. Members how this money had been found in other countries; in France, he believed, the money for re-arming the artillery was found almost exclusively from the sale of the fortifications of Paris. Well, London was not a fortified city and we had not got the happy opportunity of selling our fortifications and turning them into guns; the money in our case had to come solidly out of the Army Estimates. They were doing all that could reasonably be undertaken in the present year, and in future years they were contemplating the performance of as much as the House would allow.

With regard to another matter raised by the right hon. Gentleman, the armament of the Volunteer field artillery batteries with the new gun, there was, of course, a great divergence of opinion as to the desirability of furnishing the Auxiliary Forces with field guns. The right hon. Gentleman and he were rather in agreement on this matter, that we should utilise a portion of our Auxiliary Forces in the manipulation of the field gun. But he was bound to say that that was not the prevailing military opinion, and he thought it was not altogether unreasonable, as they had to curtail their expenditure as much as they could, not to expand too rapidly in the direction of adding to the Militia and Volunteer artillery. Already a partial experiment, however, had been made. A Volunteer heavy battery had been given the opportunity of using the field gun, and it was a perfectly fair question to ask whether they could develop this dedication of field guns to the Auxiliary Forces. But he would remind the House, at the same time, that we were in a much better position with regard to the artillery than we had ever been in before. We had actually doubled in the last few years the number of horse and field batteries, and if it should become necessary to diminish, rather than to increase, the number of the available infantry in this country, we should come much nearer to the European computation of the proportion between the field guns and the infantry which the right hon. Gentleman opposite desired we should attain. He would ask the right hon. Gentleman not to accept from him the view that this was a closed question; he did not think it was; he thought they would yet have to consider the question of how far they should entrust the field gun to the Auxiliary Forces.

*SIR JOHN COLOMB (Great Yarmouth) said the right hon. Gentleman had spoken of turning out the new guns this year. He would like to ask him whether, when speaking of this year, he meant the financial year.

*MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER said the financial year. They hoped in the current financial year to manufacture twenty-one batteries, and to prepare for the completion of a number of additional batteries in the next year.

*SIR JOHN COLOMB: Can you give an approximate date when you will be in a position to begin turning them out?

*MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER said he supposed it would be towards the end of this year, when the manufacturing firms and the Ordnance Factories would be in possession of the necessary plant and machinery. Obviously the manufacturers would not be in full swing until they had been carrying on the business for some time.

*SIR JOHN COLOMB feared there was a lack of perspective in what was proposed. He conceived it was the duty of the House to grant the Government all the money necessary, whatever the amount, to enable it to proceed with all reasonable expedition with the re-armament of the artillery, and he hoped that nothing would induce the Government to cut down a single shilling of the expenditure that was necessary for the purpose. So far as the Volunteer and Militia artillery was concerned he was not in agreement with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Forest of Dean. He did not believe in supplying the Auxiliary Forces with field guns if they were only liable to serve in the United Kingdom.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central) joined with the hon. and gallant Member for Great Yarmouth in insisting on the importance of proceeding rapidly with the re-armament of the artillery. He said the lesson, as far as they could gather it, of the war between Russia and Japan was that the superiority of the Japanese artillery had been the determining factor in every engagement. It would be false economy not to provide the very best weapon that could be got, and neglect of that duty meant serious danger to the country. It might be expensive, for guns soon got out of date, but still we were bound to supply our forces in the field with the best available armaments. As to the arming of the Volunteers with artillery, it was scandalous that that question should have been put off time after time. He wanted to point out the importance of supplying field guns to the Volunteer artillery.

COLONEL LEGGE (St. George's, Hanover Square) said that the right hon. Baronet the Member for Forest of Dean had made a charge against the War Office in connection with the delay in arming the artillery with new quick-firing guns. The Memorandum presented to the House at the commencement of the session by the Secretary of State for War set forth that the manufacture of the quick-firing guns and equipment was about to commence. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War now told the House that the manufacture of these guns had commenced and would be completed in three years time. That was exactly the time mentioned by his right hon. friend which it took the Japanese Government to reconstruct their artillery armaments; and if, at the end of three years, our artillery was as good and as well served as that of the Japanese, he did not think we would have much cause to complain. He wished to draw attention to the question of the lance——

*SIR CHARLES DILKE said that he had only spoken specifically in respect of Item B.

*MR. SPEAKER said that it would be more convenient if the hon. and gallant Member were to make his observations on the main question rather than on this particular Amendment.

*MR. J. F. HOPE (Sheffield, Brightside) said he sympathised greatly with the object of the right hon. Baronet the Member for Forest of Dean in proposing this reduction; because, on the face of it, he did not see why the manufacture of the whole of the artillery should not have been taken in hand at once, at any cost. They were, of course, cribbed, cabined, and confined in this matter by financial necessities, because they, too, had to draw their finances from a limited number of sources of taxation. He did not wish to go further into the question; but he wanted to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office exactly how the matter stood in regard to the orders for these guns. He thought that the hon. Gentleman, in answer to a Question put some time ago, stated that the orders for guns for the Indian Army would be given out as quickly as possible, and that they would be allocated in the proportion of two-thirds to the trade, and one-third to the Government arsenals. Had the orders been given out in these proportions? The private firms had two claims on the Government; first, because they had been specifically asked in former times to increase their means of production. But these means of production could not be made available in times of stress unless they were employed in times of peace. A distinct and plain pledge was given in that regard by the present Chief Secretary for Ireland, by the Secretary for India, and confirmed by the now Secretary of State for War. It had recently been the fashion to talk of the distress caused by the dismissal of Government servants at the Government arsenals, but there were other places in the kingdom, such as Sheffield, where there had been no less distress on account of the lack of Government orders.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (MR. BROMLEY DAVENPORT, Cheshire, Macclesfield) said that the right hon. Member had asked for some specific information as to the manufacture of quick-firing guns. He said that the manufacture of the whole of these guns should be taken in hand at once without reference to cost. The hon. Gentleman below the gangway said that the right policy was for the Government to come to Parliament and ask for any money needful to provide the guns necessary for the service of the Army with all reasonable expedition.

*MR. J. F. HOPE said that what he had stated was that that was an ideal policy.

MR. BROMLEY DAVENPORT said he quite agreed, everybody agreed, and he hoped the House of Commons would agree, that whatever it might be necessary for the War Office to ask the House for this purpose should be given. We should see, however, how that would be next year. He did not quite understand the object of the question raised by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Forest of Dean. The right hon. Baronet talked about throwing the expenditure on the year after next.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE said that he based himself on the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War on the Estimates, and on the answer to a Question that day when he asked the right hon. Gentlemen to specify what was the amount of the charge in the next financial year and in the year after that, because the armament was announced to be completed by the 31st March, 1907.

MR. BROMLEY DAVENPORT said that during the present year, 1904–5, no batteries were to be made for this country. The batteries to be made this year were to be made for India. Next year the batteries were to be made for home, and the year after that, 1906–7, under present arrangements the whole programme would be completed.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE said that what he had asserted was that the bulk of the money would be spent in the year after next.

MR. BROMLEY DAVENPORT said the fact was that practically one-half of it would be spent next year, and there was an extra £550,000 which would be spent the year after next. He thought it was hardly fair, in respect of a total expenditure of between £3,000,000 and £4,000,000, to say that the bulk of the expenditure had been put on the year after next.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE said that the bulk of the expenditure in the year after next would fall on this country.

MR. BROMLEY DAVENPORT said that as a matter of fact next year the expenditure would be £1,300,000, and beyond that there would be an extra sum of £550,000 although the guns would not have been completed and the year after there would also be an expenditure of £1,300,000. That was the programme at the present time, and he did not think it was quite accurate to say that the bulk of the money would be spent in the year after next or that there was any deliberate attempt on the part of the Government to postpone asking for what money was necessary to arm the artillery. His hon. friend the Member for Brightside had raised a very interesting and difficult question, which, however, he thought it would be rather inconvenient to discuss at the present moment. What he could say was that the allocation of the orders for guns would be made according to accepted principles, which were, as he had said, that the trade reserves should be taken advantage of as well as the reserves of the Government factories. But he thought that his hon. friend rather overstated the case when he said that the private firms had a claim on the Government. It was true that the Government had encouraged these firms to lay out very large sums of money in the provision of plant and machinery as a reserve power of supply of armaments. The Government had regarded the existence of that plant and machinery as a reserve power of supply and that, unless that power of supply were there, it would be absolutely necessary for the Government to provide that reserve power of supply. In other words, the reserve at present existing in the plant and machinery at Woolwich would have to be very much larger.

Mr. J. F. HOPE asked if any orders had yet been given out to private firms.

Mr. BROMLEY DAVENPORT said that no orders had yet been given.

Question put.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Mr. Warner and Capt. Norton.

COLONEL LEGGE said he would again urge on the Secretary of State for War not to lose sight of the question of lances and pistols for the cavalry. They were abolished without due consideration; and he hoped the question would be reconsidered. All European cavalry had retained the lance. It was stated in the Press that the Russian Lancers had recently overwhelmed the Japanese cavalry; and that was about the only success which the Russians had achieved during the present war. He hoped his right hon. friend would give the matter his best consideration.

MR. COURTENAY WARNER (Staffordshire, Lichfield) said he wished to ask a question as to the financial aspect of the manner in which the War Office conducted its business. At present, the infantry and cavalry were being re-armed with new rifles; and he should like to know the ratio, not only in money but also in rifles, between the Government factories and private contractors. It had been stated that rifles could be produced at the Government arsenals at about £3 a piece, whereas private firms charged £4. It had been suggested that interest on buildings and capital and depreciation should be taken into consideration. The one item not allowed for was the cost of the land on which the factory stood, but as that would not have been very expensive at the time the factory was built a penny per rifle would probably more than cover it, so that that would not account for the difference. It was said to be necessary that private factories should be kept going in order that in time of war there should be room for expansion in the supply. But that argument cut both ways. The larger the Small Arms Factory, the easier it would be to increase it. The Government factory would be able much more easily than a private firm to increase its machinery. It would be all very well to keep outside firms going if they produced the rifles at anything like the cost in the Government factories; but the paying of 25 per cent. more should be deferred until the emergency arose, especially as a great deal of distress at present existed in consequence of the shortage of work at the Small Arms Factory. He regarded it as a monstrous piece of War Office mismanagement that this waste of money should go on. Every possible economy in War Office administration ought to be effected, but if millions of money were to be wasted in this fashion there would be no hope of securing an efficient Army at a smaller cost. The efficiency of the Army depended upon the artillery more than anything else, but our guns fired only one shot to the foreigner's three, so that in the event of war we should be at a terrible disadvantage in the one arm upon which every victory in the present struggle in the East had depended.

*SIR JOHN COLOMB desired to repeat his protest against the placing on the Army Estimates of the charge for submarine mines and Brennan torpedoes. The capital expenditure on the Brennan torpedo, which was introduced ten or twelve years ago, had been nearly half a million of money; it had cost something like £32,000 a year, and the charge under this particular item was £12,500. For submarine mines a sum of £61,000 was asked for. He protested altogether against these methods of defence being charged on the Army Estimates. Looking at the question broadly, ought we not to learn a lesson from the present position of Port Arthur with regard to submarine mines? He did not want to run the risk of having mines loose at the mouth of the Thames. He objected to the policy altogether. The maritime defence of this country would have to be active; it could not be passive, nor could it be handed over to the Army. He did not ask the Secretary of State to make any statement on the subject, he simply desired to repeat the protest he had often made. A big principle was involved, and in the new Army scheme, which he hoped would be carefully considered before it was produced, attention would have to be paid to the question of how far it was right to devote money voted for Army purposes to these aquatic arrangements, which he believed to be altogether bad in principle and absolutely in the wrong hands.

*CAPTAIN NORTON (Newington, W.) said the present Secretary of State for War was exonerated to some extent from the blame for the gross mismanagement which had taken place in connection with the supplying of the Army with a suitable rifle. On March 7th it was stated that a new rifle had been in course of manufacture for some time; therefore the Government had had ample time to deal with the question in a manner other than that they had adopted. The fact that £700,000 was to fall on the finances of India went to show that much of the expenditure which ought really to be borne upon the Votes this year was being cast forward to subsequent years. The rifle with which we fought the South African War, the old Lee-Enfield, was defective in sighting. That defect was well known to the manufacturers, but the rifles went through the ordinary inspection, and it was nobody's duty to call the attention of the Government to the fact that we had rifles with defective sights. The effect of that was that thousands of men sacrificed their lives in South Africa because they had not a weapon that would shoot, and the widows of these men were now endeavouring to keep their children out of the workhouse. He contended that if there had been effective inspection those lives would not have been sacrificed. The guilt of this lay at the door of the Government, of which the right hon. Gentleman was a member. But what were the Government doing now? The cost of the Lee-Enfield was about 52s., yet the Government were throwing away the country's money by tinkering up these rifles and issuing them to the troops as converted weapons. They required in the first place new barrels and new sights, a new charger to simplify the drop of the cartridge into the magazine, and the extension of the magazine to such an extent as to hold ten cartridges. Then the body required to be altered and the stock; and although these stocks had been knocked about in the South African War, and in some cases had had pieces of wood let in, these weapons were to be issued as converted to the troops. The original cost was only 52s. and this, as he understood, was a matter of economy. What he wanted to know was how much this conversion was going to cost, because his contention was that these rifles were not worth converting.

If the Government were guilty of wasting public money with regard to the conversion of these old rifles, they were much more so in connection with the new rifle, because what took place with regard to the new rifle was that, although they had been in the course of construction for some time, at the present moment there were not more than 15,000 or 16,000 in existence. Owing to its terrible defects it was most unreliable. One of the great defects of the new rifle was its terrible recoil, which was so great that he had seen large numbers of men afraid to shoot with it. To obviate the recoil the Government had had the barrels enlarged at the muzzle with the result that no shooting power could be got out of it. The shooting had become irregular. If India was to be supplied with seventy-one thousand stands of arms, there ought to be 60,000 of these rifles now ready, but owing to the initial mistakes and the consequent experiments there were only 15,000 or 16,000. The right hon. Gentleman was, of course, anxious to give a fair share of this work to private firms, but he ventured to assert that if those firms followed the specifications given to them the result would be the production of a rifle which would not shoot. The result of all the investigations that had taken place was that they had come back to the old parallel barrel with progression in the rifling only. If he were asked how this should be obviated and how the viewing should be done, his answer would be that the manufacturers should be made responsible for the barrel and that the viewing should be done by their foremen who were competent for the work. But what was the position with regard to the Small Arms Factories at Enfield? There they had some 2,500 men who had been experimenting for more than a year and no rifles had been issued, and if the House took into consideration the high pay these men got, the cost of these rifles came out not at £4 but at £15 or £16 each.

Then, with regard to the machine guns, he would like to know how many Maxims, how many Nordenfeldts, and how many Gardiner guns we had, and what each gun cost the country when obtained from the manufacturers as against what they cost when manufactured in our Small Arms Factories. He would also like to know what orders had been given for these various guns and to whom they had been given, because his contention was that the country's money had been wasted, first by experimental processes, and secondly by an unfair proportion of orders being given to private firms. At the present time the Small Arms Factory at Enfield was doing one-third of the work it usually did, and he contended the orders should not be given out until the Government factories were working at higher pressure. What had occurred? During the war the Enfield factory was only working at an average of ten hours a day whilst private firms were working three eight-hour shifts. It was clear, therefore, that at that time advantage was not taken of the Government arsenals. In some departments of the Enfield factory there was from 50 to 70 per cent. of the plant lying idle whilst large orders were going to Birmingham and other places; not that he had any objection to orders going anywhere, but he had a special interest in seeing that the Government factories did their fair share of work. He disclaimed any intention to cast any slur on the heads of the factory at Enfield, who always did their best, but it was not, in his opinion, possible for any official to carry out the work satisfactorily if he were compelled to keep an experienced staff at a high price which he could not utilise. In this year, when we were not at war, they were turning out at Enfield only half the work which they turned out in the years when the Lee-Enfield was being manufactured. They had heard recently a great deal about the importance of artillery fire. What won battles was not artillery but rifle fire, and this was of the greatest importance in the class of country in which the British Army was usually called upon to operate. Notwithstanding this they found the Government shirking their duty by not turning out the maximum number of rifles at Enfield and elsewhere, and they were not arming our force with the best weapon that could be produced.

*MR. HUNT (Shropshire, Ludlow) said that some people held that it did not matter much whether the rifle was very accurate or not, but that was not his opinion. He thought if the new rifle did not shoot accurately it would be a great pity to have a large number made before the rifle had been thoroughly tested. The great idea of the War Office nowadays of teaching recruits to shoot appeared to be to keep them snapping at their inspector's eye. Probably the recruits got bored by this process. It struck him that if they wanted to teach men to shoot they should begin early and shoot with miniature rifles, if not, even an air-gun was better than the snapping business. He hoped that before this question was finally settled the rifle would be thoroughly tested by the Auxiliary as well as the Regular Forces, because, if, as reported, the rifle kicked considerably, it would be a fatal objection to its use, especially by the Auxiliary Forces. They had now brought the sights nearer together and consequently shooting had been rendered more difficult. He did not think that there was the slightest advantage in having the rifle shortened for infantry and mounted infantry, and in his opinion a long rifle was much easier to shoot with than a short one.

MAJOR SEELY (Isle of Wight) urged the Secretary for War to pause before proceeding with the manufacture of the new rifle. It was getting more and more difficult in this country to obtain suitable practice with the rifle owing to the crowded nature of these islands, and they had been obliged to shoot with reduced charges both in the Regular Army, the Auxiliaries, and in the rifle clubs as a means of getting out of the difficulty. All this shooting was of great and substantial value so long as the difference between firing with reduced ammunition and a full charge was very slight. If they had a new rifle in which the recoil was greater the value of this kind of shooting practice would be enormously reduced. He took a deep interest in rifle clubs and he was loth to see a weapon adopted which would render the practice now being carried out in his part of the country of less value than it was at the present time, and he urged the right hon. Gentleman to consider whether it would not be advisable to see that the new rifle should have as little recoil as possible. It might be that the new model would give a less recoil, and if he could be assured on that point it would be a great relief not only to himself but also to all those who took an interest in amateur rifle shooting.

His principal reason for rising was to call attention to the extraordinary position in which the nation stood in regard to the re-arming of the artillery. It was perfectly true that battles were won to a great extent by the rifle, but it was no less true that they were also won to a great extent by artillery; and although it was a matter of controversy as to whether the new rifle or the old one was the best, there was no doubt the artillery of the British Army was the worst used by any civilised nation of any importance in the world. The position was so extraordinary that he ventured to ask the House to consider it. If they were asked to name the greatest military curiosity the reply would be that the richest nation in the world had the worst artillery. The difference between the artillery this country possessed and that possessed by the great countries with whom they might possibly be at war was not a difference of degree but of kind. There was a great difference in the velocity of the shot, in the first place; in the second place there was a difference in the fact that the ammunition was fixed in one piece; and thirdly, there was the difference that recoil in the new gun was worked by a mechanical arrangement on the carriage. The consequence was that whereas the old gun with which our Army was armed—with the solitary exception of a few batteries—could only fire from one to two shots per minute, the gun which they might have had and which had been adopted by other countries fired between twelve and eighteen shots per minute. The Financial Secretary knew from his own experience in the field of war how fatal it was to be possessed of a gun of which a battery was of less value than one gun possessed by the enemy. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would give them a more satisfactory assurance upon this subject than he had given up to the present as to what efforts were being made to remedy this extraordinary state of affairs. On the 7th of March they were assured that the gun had been chosen, that it had been tested, and that it had shown results of a startling nature. All the artillery experts and others who saw the trials, they were informed, were wholly and entirely convinced that the danger they ran in not adopting this quick-firing gun was very great. On the 7th March they were told that the manufacture of this gun would begin within a month of that date. Some three and a half months had since elapsed, and not only had the manufacture of this gun not commenced but no orders for it had been given. No doubt the right hon. Gentleman was determined that they must have a good gun, but they had been stopped by considerations of economy so misplaced as to be absolutely deplorable. He was perfectly certain that if the right hon. Gentleman could say that the matter would receive immediate attention, and would ask the Opposition to permit a sum to be voted to re-arm the Army in this country and in India with a quick-firing gun, the Government would receive the unanimous consent of the House and the country. The men in the artillery felt the inferiority in which this wealthy country was placed in this respect. In South Africa our Army was in the strange position of being, not only out-ranged, but outnumbered owing to the enemy possessing quick-firing guns. They were told the other day that the Gatling guns out-ranged our own. They were told also tha the guns used by the Boers in South Africa, and those used by the Chinese out-ranged our own. He submitted that the country and the Army did not wish to be any longer trifled with in this matter. They were assured that the re-armament of the Army would be commenced when the gun was chosen. The gun was chosen ten months ago and no order had yet been given. The gun was tried, and the late Commander-in-Chief decided that no substantial improvement could be made.

*MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER said he saw this gun only a few weeks ago. It had only then been decided which of the competing guns should be adopted. The delay was due to the further investigation of the merits of the weapons by the committee who had been dealing with it.

MAJOR SEELY said he knew that no blame attached to the right hon. Gentleman, but the fact was that whereas this gun was decided upon, in substance, ten months ago, constant delay, had occurred in regard to the matter of breech arrangements. The matter had been delayed and delayed, and he challenged denial when he said that the real reason for this had been that £3.250,000 was an inconvenient sum to spend. He knew that was not the view o the Secretary of State for War. It had been the view in the past, and he thought both sides of the House were with him when he asked that an absolute assurance should be given that this vital matter would be no longer delayed.

SIR A. HAYTER (Walsall) said he wished to ask the Financial Secretary one or two Questions. On page 61 of the Estimates, Vote 9, under heading "G. Equipment Stores," harness and saddlery for 1904–5 showed a decrease of £37,000, accoutrements a decrease of £90,000, and transport vehicles a decrease of £75,000, as compared with the amounts in the preceding year. Was there such a surplus of these articles at the close of the war as to warrant these reductions, or was it the intention to permanently diminish the quantities kept in store? The Public Accounts Committee had before them evidence that there was a great lack of saddles during the latter part of the war. The saddles sent out for the Yeomanry were described as unfit for any man to sit on, and others were bought up on the veldt almost, or anywhere in South Africa. The saddles which were sold had fetched almost ridiculous prices. He assumed from the amount of the appropriation-in-aid, which was very little different from that of last year, that the sales of stores in South Africa were very nearly concluded. That made him all the more anxious to know what was the cause of the diminutions in the amounts taken this year for the stores to which he had referred.

*COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.) said he was astonished that the Secretary of State for War had denied that the new rifle had more recoil than the old one. It was the "kick" that the men felt, and many a man would not shoot, if he could possibly avoid doing so, on account of the "kick." It seemed to him to be a physical impossibility not to increase the recoil of the rifle if, with a lighter barrel, the same class of powder were used. He wished to have an explanation of that. The new rifle might even be very much worse in some respects than the old one. His experience had been that weapons were very nearly always enhanced in value as the length of the barrel was increased. There was greater distance between the sights of the weapon, and, therefore, it was easier to aim. On the other hand, when the length of the barrel was decreased that advantage was correspondingly lessened. The figures which had lately been published on the subject were against the theory of the Secretary of State for War that the "kick" was not greater. He believed that what had been done was to put six or eight years modern improvements into the new rifle, but they might make away with these improvements by taking five inches off the length of the rifle. The latest model of any rifle ought to be the best, but that did not always happen, because sometimes people were foolish. In this case it was possible that the shortening of the rifle might do away with the good effects of the improvements. Lord Roberts was entitled to his opinion, but for his own part he would sooner have the opinion of people who had experimented with the weapon than the opinion of the greatest general, even that of Napoleon or Wellington, as to the class of arms best suited for the service. He had the greatest distrust of the shortening of the rifle. It seemed to him a very extraordinary thing if the War Department was without the best type of quick-firing artillery. It was, however, a very hard thing to get. He differed from the hon. Member for the Isle of Wight, who said that quick-firing depended partly on loading and partly on the recoil. The loading had very little to do with it. Any gun could be loaded quickly. It was entirely a question of checking the recoil. It was no use spending all this money if they were not to get a really good rifle. He thought that 5,000 of the new rifles should be distributed not only in the Army, but among the Militia and Volunteers, so that the weapon could be thoroughly tested by impartial men.

COLONEL BLUNDELL (Lancashire, Ince) said that as to the length of the barrel, when he was in the Rifle Brigade they were always told that the rifle with a long barrel was the best for aiming at long distances. He hoped the Secretary of State for War would not sacrifice efficiency in the new weapon in order to get a rifle which was convenient to be carried on horseback by cavalry and mounted infantry.

MR. BROMLEY DAVENPORT said, in regard to the Question put by the right hon. Member for Walsall, that there was no intention permanently to reduce the equipment stores. Hon. Gentlemen had drawn attention to the new guns and the new rifles. He was not qualified to speak of the new guns, but he thought that everybody admitted that there was a deficiency in the quick-firing guns.

MAJOR SEELY: The only deficiency in the new guns is that they are not there.

MR. BROMLEY DAVENPORT said that with reference to the new rifle, it must at once be admitted that the shortening of the barrel would probably increase the recoil. But he did not think that ought to cover the whole question, because it was equally obvious that there were compensating advantages, such as the lightness and handiness of the rifle. Experiments had been made in shooting, and in another place the figures had been given. At 500 yards the long rifle—i.e., the old rifle, beat the short rifle by ·05 per foot; at 600 yards the short rifle beat the long by ·09 per foot; at 1,000 yards the long rifle beat the short by ·17 per foot; at 1,500 yards the short rifle beat the long by ·68 per foot; and at 1,700 yards the short rifle beat the long by ·09 per foot. The firing was from the shoulder. He would put it no higher than this, that the shooting of the rifles appeared to be equal, and when to that was added the compensating advantages of the short rifle, he thought there was no doubt that the new rifle would be a very great improvement. The cost of the conversion of the old rifle was £2 5s. the cost of the new rifle being £3 10s. and the converted rifle was not inferior to the new rifle.

A question of principle had been raised in regard to the employment of the trade for the manufacture of rifles. It seemed that that was alleged sometimes as a labour, and sometimes as an economical, grievance. It was not a labour grievance at all, however, for it did not make the slightest difference to the body of British working men whether the wages paid for work done were paid in Enfield, Sheffield, Newcastle, or elsewhere. It made a difference, of course, to the workmen at Woolwich or Enfield; that, however, was not a labour grievance but a local grievance. Trouble had befallen that particular branch of labour with the reduction of employment that came at the end of the great inflation which prevailed during the South African War. It was not only at Enfield that there had been distress. He was told that at the present time there were 10,000 men fewer employed upon Government work in private firms than during the war. It was fair that these facts should be considered, when it was suggested that an injustice had been done to the locality at Enfield or at Woolwich, because the Government had pursued a policy not of its own creation, but approved by its predecessors for many years past. It was not the case that in regard to rifles an undue proportion of the work had been given to private firms; on the contrary, the general principle had been departed from in favour of the factories. He was convinced that it was right and proper as a general principle that the Government should make use of private establishments which had spent large sums in laying down plant and machinery in reserve for emergencies and crises whenever they might arise. If the Government plant was to be kept fully employed by taking away from the trade their proportion of the work, then private firms would certainly reduce their plant to the level of their own requirements. But there must be a reserve, and in that case the Government would be forced to have an enormously increased reserve at Enfield and at Woolwich. He was not in a position to say exactly what proportion of rifles were given to private firms and what proportion were made in Government factories, but he thought it was about half and half. He had figures which showed that there had been a great reduction in the number of men engaged on Government work by private firms. One firm which employed 4,602 men on Government work during the war now only employed 3,209; another firm which had been employing 1,400 men now only employed 700; in a third there was a decrease from 2,700 men to 400 men. He had expressly indicated that this question could not be confined to rifles only. It was a question of policy and principle. Altogether, he was informed that 10,000 fewer men were now engaged in Government work than were employed during the war. It was fair that the fact should be considered when hon. Members suggested that an injustice was being done to certain localities because the Government had pursued a policy which had been approved by their predecessors.

CAPTAIN NORTON said he accepted the policy as a whole; but, in his opinion, an undue proportion of rifle work had been given to private contractors.

MR. BROMLEY DAVENPORT said he was glad to know that the hon. Gentleman accepted the policy. The reduction of the men employed by private firms in Government work showed that the general principle had not been departed from. He was laying down a general principle, which he was convinced was sound, namely, that it was right and proper that the Government should make use of private contractors who had laid out very large sums in providing plant and machinery in order that they might be a reserve in periods of crises. It was suggested that it was an injustice to the localities that the Government should keep plant and machinery lying idle, while they gave orders to private firms. Let him press that contention to its logical conclusion. If the Government factories were to be fully employed, the private firms would reduce their machinery, and the Government would be, as a consequence, obliged to put in at Enfield and Woolwich an enormous reserve of plant and machinery and that would be a perpetuation of the evil.

MR. COURTENAY WARNER asked what was the ratio of rifle work in money and rifles as between Government factories and private firms.

MR. BROMLEY DAVENPORT said he could not state that at the moment; but he thought he was right in saying that it was half and half.

MR. COURTENAY WARNER asked if that was money or rifles.

MR. BROMLEY DAVENPORT said it was the value of the production.

*COLONEL BOWLES (Middlesex, Enfield) said that that was a very important question, because the rifle produced in the Government factories cost £3 10s. 6d., whereas the rifle produced by private firms cost £4 10s., which meant some 30 per cent. more.

MR. BROMLEY DAVENPORT said he did not mean money in that sense at all. He thought the hon. Member was calling attention to the conversion of the old rifles, not to new rifles.

MR. COURTENAY WARNER asked if the conditions as to the time allowed were the same.

MR. BROMLEY DAVENPORT said the contract for the rifles would terminate at the end of 1905.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE said that the hon. Gentleman had not answered the question put by his hon. friend the Member for the Isle of Wight in regard to the delay in providing the guns.

*COLONEL BOWLES said that the Financial Secretary to the War Office suggested that the Government did not include rent or interest on money in the price of the rifle manufactured by the Government. It was not quite fair to put it in that way, because in all those accounts a certain amount had been allowed for all such charges. In considering this matter, the House, in order to be perfectly fair as between the Government factories and private firms, should understand what the cost of the rifles really was. He thought that the price now given to the trade was excessive. He agreed that a large proportion of the work should be given to the trade, as it both stimulated the Government factories and the trade; but it was right that the country should have some guidance as to the price that was being paid; and he hoped that the Government factories would be given an opportunity of producing their figures as well as private firms.

SIR CARNE RASCH (Essex, Chelmsford) said that, as an old musketry instructor, he did not think that there was much fault to be found with the new rifle. It was better balanced, was easier to handle, and had a lower trajectory.

He did not understand the objection of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Forest of Dean to the retubing of the old guns. That was really a matter of economy. He should like to refer to the weight of the cavalry saddles, bridles, and swords. He could not conceive any worse or more useless weapon than the cavalry sword. It was badly balanced; it was heavy where it should be light, and light where it should be heavy. He would prefer to fight a man with a broomstick rather than with such a weapon. He could not understand why the saddles and bridles were made so enormously and ridiculously heavy. They were, it was true, better than they used to be; but that was not saying much. The bridles had pounds of steel which were quite unnecessary; and that also applied to the saddles. It was said that the heavier they were the longer they would last. That was perfectly true; but if it were carried to its logical conclusion, they might be made heavier and heavier until they would last forever, but then an elephant would be required to carry them. That was really no argument at all. Although the weight had been considerably reduced, yet, at present, a dragoon rode at eighteen stone, and a hussar, who was supposed to be a light cavalry man, at fourteen stone. There was an immense amount of hide-bound red tape which prevented the weight being reduced. The obvious thing was that the kit and the cooking tins should not be carried on the horse. They should be carried on squadron carts. If that were done the cavalry would be infinitely more mobile; and he ventured to suggest to the mind of the intelligent Secretary of State for War that that would make the cavalry more useful.

Resolution agreed to.

Resolutions read a second time.

First Resolution.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth agree with the Commiteee in the said Resolution."

Mr. EDMUND ROBERTSON (Dundee) complained that these Naval Votes had rather suddenly been sprung upon the House; that two days ago the Prime Minister had stated that he only proposed to take Votes 1 and 8, and therefore he (Mr. Robertson) moved that this particular item be postponed, and that the same course should be taken with the following Votes.

*The SECRETARY to the ADMIRALTY (Mr. Pretyman, Suffolk, Woodbridge) said he consented to the Motion.

Motion made, and Question "That the debate be now adjourned"—(Mr. Edmund Robertson)—put, and agreed to.

Debate to be resumed upon Monday next.

Second Resolution.

Mr. EDMUND ROBERTSON said with regard to the subject matter of this Vote he might remind the House that when the Naval Votes were last before the Committee of Supply the serious discussion as to the naval programme of the year was by general consent postponed to a later date, and he did not propose to go into that matter now, but to wait until the new policy of the Admiralty was stated. There were only one or two points to which he would call attention. One was the question of boilers.

*Mr. SPEAKER was understood to rule that the question of boilers could not be raised upon this Vote.

Mr. EDMUND ROBERTSON said that in Committee of Supply the Committee had been allowed to discuss the whole question on this particular Vote but if Mr. Speaker ruled that he was out of order in discussing it now he would reserve what he had to say on that point. What he really wished to do, so far as Mr. Speaker's ruling would permit, was to call the special attention of the House to the unique circumstances under which this Vote was being taken this year. One of the most remarkable examples of the way in which the financial control of this House was being curtailed was that after the House had limited by its Rules the number of days on which Supply was to be discussed they found that a large portion of the time allotted for the discussion of Supply was taken up by the discussion of private business. The Government was not responsible for this, nor was the official whose duty it was to regulate private business in the House. He made no complaint with regard to it and merely desired to point out that on every occasion when Supply was to be discussed——

*Mr. SPEAKER said that this subject was not relevant to the Vote under discussion.

Mr. EDMUND ROBERTSON said he was induced to mention the fact because of the circumstance that a great portion of the time of the Evening Sitting was to be occupied by the discussion of a private Bill. What he wanted to know, in the interest of public business, was what would be the exact financial result of passing this Resolution. The House must remember that this Resolution had been suddenly sprung upon it, and that in answer to an inquiry he made, it was stated that it was necessary for Treasury reasons. That immediately put him on the scent of his right hon. friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The real reason why this Vote was to be passed to-day was that it would enable the Admiralty to get hold of money which had been granted for other purposes, by the one Consolidated Fund Act that had been passed this session, for naval purposes. Few Members of Parliament were aware of the fact recently stated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer that under the Public Accounts and Charges Act of 1891 it was possible to direct to Navy or Army purposes money voted by the House for Civil Service purposes. He might be permitted to say that the money granted at the beginning of the session for Naval Supply amounted to about twelve weeks supply, while that for the Army was about three weeks supply, and that for the Civil Services about twenty-three weeks supply. It might very well be that the naval money was now exhausted because they were now told that the large sum granted in the beginning of the year for Civil Services would have to be made available for the Naval Vote. That was a matter that was well worth the serious consideration of the House, because it was owing to that fact that the House now found itself in this extraordinary position. Everything would be legitimised if these Resolutions were followed by Resolutions of Ways and Means to provide the money, and by the setting up of a new Consolidated Fund Bill. That was an old constitutional practice of the House which the Chancellor of the Exchequer understood as well as anybody.

*Mr. SPEAKER said he failed to see how this subject could be raised on the Resolution now before the House.

Mr. EDMUND ROBERTSON said his point was that the passing of these Resolutions would have a most unusual consequence unless followed by the practice which he had indicated. It would mean the allocation of money granted for one purpose to quite a different purpose.

Mr. BUCHANAN (Perthshire, E.) asked whether the Committee were not entitled to information from the Chancellor of the Exchequer as to whether if they passed this Resolution there was any security that the money would be expended on the purposes for which it was voted.

*Mr. SPEAKER said that that point could not be raised on the question of whether or not the sum mentioned was one which ought to be voted for the purpose named in the Resolution. He would not raise any objection to a Question being asked and answered across the floor of the House, but he was bound to object to a discussion as to what was the legal and constitutional method of ultimately dealing with the Supply, whether by a Consolidated Fund Bill, by the Appropriation Bill at the end of the session or by a Resolution under the Act of 1891. The question here was whether the sum named was a proper sum to be granted.

Mr. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.) asked whether it was not open to his hon. friend to point out the inconvenience of the Committee voting this sum of money for a particular purpose when there was reason to believe it would be applied to another purpose.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER (Mr. Austen Chamberlain, Worcestershire, E.) thought the point the hon. Member desired to raise had reference to the effect of Section 2 (1) of the Public Accounts and Charges Act, 1891, and he submitted that that was not a matter that could be discussed in Committee of Supply or on Report. The course of action was laid down by statute and the action of the Treasury was in pursuance of the statute.

Mr. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) pointed out that the statement of the right hon. Gentleman was the converse of the argument of the hon. Member for Dundee, whose complaint was that money already capable of being issued under the Act of 1891 would be issued for this service if the Resolution were voted. Was it not pertinent to the passing of the Resolution that the House should consider what its effect would be?

*Mr. SPEAKER said it would not be pertinent to inquire whether, after the money was granted, it was likely the Treasury would act legally or illegally in appropriating money for the purposes named in the Resolution. That question did not arise on the Vote in Committee of Supply or on Report.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said the question of the Treasury acting legally or illegally did not arise. There was no Question that the Treasury could legally take money voted for the Civil Service, and, if this Resolution were passed, apply it to the purposes of the Navy; and that, he believed, was the objection entertained by the hon. Member opposite to the passing of the Resolution.

*MR. SPEAKER said that made it quite clear that the question referred to by the hon. Member for Dundee could not arise on the Resolution, as the suggestion was simply that something would take place which was perfectly legal under an Act of Parliament. The hon. Member was finding fault with that Act.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON said it was extremely difficult to state the point he desired to make. He did not challenge the law as stated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. What he wanted to point out was that on the facts of the present year the passing of this Resolution would have serious consequences. Money granted for the Civil Service in the first Consolidated Fund Act might, would, and must be applied by the Government to purposes other than that for which it was voted.

*MR. SPEAKER: I still think that this is not in order on this Resolution.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON said he had nearly finished all he intended to say on the matter, and he thanked Mr. Speaker for the consideration he had shown him.

MR. KEARLEY (Devonport) called attention to the manner in which a man permanently injured in the service of the Admiralty had been treated by the Department. The Admiralty had a scheme, to which the employees had assented, by which they contracted out of the Workmen's Compensation Act. The man to whose case he desired to refer had been permanently injured through a piece of timber falling on his head, and the Admiralty, instead of giving the man a pension or compensation in accordance with their agreement—under which persons permanently disabled were promised $\frac{24}{60}$ths of their last emoluments—had simply made him an allowance for six months, at the end of which period the case was to be further considered. The accident happened sixteen months ago and he submitted that the Admiralty ought now to deal with the case in the manner provided for by the agreement. There was no doubt whatever as to the total and permanent disablement, and it was extremely hard that the sufferings of the man should be aggravated by the anxiety and worry connected with the uncertainty of the future. If the workman was in a position to lodge a complaint with the Registrar of Friendly Societies, an inquiry would be held, and the power of contracting out withdrawn from the Admiralty. The matter was a most important one as the case was merely typical of many, and he would be glad to hear the Admiralty's explanation of the business. He wished to raise another question. A couple of months ago he pointed out the rental conditions of Devonport and that it would be only fair to make the same arrangements there as appertained in London by which the police received lodging allowance on a scale according to the conditions of the rent they had to pay. The Home Secretary gave an undertaking that he would have an inquiry held by the Chief Commissioner of Police, and that if what he had stated was found to be true he would make allowance as in the Metropolis. He had given the Home Secretary three hours notice that the question was going to be raised, but the right hon. Gentleman had not yet arrived in the House. Under those circumstances he did not know what his rights would be. Had he to continue speaking until the right hon. Gentleman came in? [AN HON. MEMBER: You had better not sit down.] Meanwhile he would turn to another question, there were a considerable number of discharges going on in Devonport dockyard. He believed about 200 men had been under notice during the last two or three weeks. It might possibly be due to some adjustment between one branch and another.

*MR. PRETYMAN: That is the fact.

MR. KEARLEY said he had mentioned all he desired to say and he did not wish to waste the time of the House by killing time until the Home Secretary should arrive. He thought the right hon. Gentleman might treat the House with more consideration.

*MR. PRETYMAN said he would ask his right hon. friend to give a reply to the question when he came in.

MR. REGINALD LUCAS (Portsmouth) said he had received some correspondence upon the same subject and perhaps his right hon. friend would be able to tell him whether the matter had been considered.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. AKERS-DOUGLAS, Kent, St. Augustine's) said he had made inquiries in Devonport and other dockyards into the circumstances in which the police had to find accommodation. On the whole the rent did not seem to press so heavily on the men in these stations as it did in London, but there was it seemed to him sufficient reason for extending the minimum allowance granted in London of 1s. 6d. per week to such cases in the dockyards as came within the same conditions as governed the grant in London. He saw no reason why the dockyard police should be treated differently, and he was ready to apply the same regulations under the same conditions as applied in London, e.g., that the men lived in approved quarters near their work and necessarily paid 6s. a week and upwards for rent.

MR. BUCHANAN asked for a short statement as to the views of the Government in regard to the naval programme which was laid before the House at the begining of the year. It was more than two months since the Vote was passed in Committee of Supply, and more than three months since the Navy Estimates were laid before the House, and a good deal had happened since then. They were told early in the session that the naval programme might have to be modified, and he pointed out at that time that it was unwise from a financial point of view, when grave problems in naval warfare in the Far East were being solved, to commit this country irretrievably to the full programme of construction, which was exceedingly costly, and in regard to which they were not absolutely clear that they had arrived at the best possible type. He alluded in particular to the expenditure recommended this year, amounting to over £3,000,000, upon the three battleships of the "King Edward VII." type which they were told were of a type that the Admiralty did not originally intended to adopt, but which at the last moment they resolved to build. In regard to the scouts built within the last two or three years that seemed to him to be a rather rash form of expenditure.

*MR. PRETYMAN: That question wil come up under a subsequent Vote.

MR. BUCHANAN said he was only going to say that this was another illustration of the way in which the Admiralty was apt to commit itself somewhat rapidly to a form of construction which would entail a very large expenditure before they were satisfied that it was the best form of ship to construct. This caused them to be suspicious of the way the Admiralty undertook large expenditure. He wished to know whether the Secretary to the Admiralty would during the present session state if the naval programme was going to be modified in any degree, and, if so, would he also say in what way it was going to be modified.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE said there had been a good many changes backwards and forwards with regard to Wei-hai-Wei. He noticed on page 120 of the Navy Estimates an expenditure of £500 for a King's Harbour Master and Naval Executive Officer at Wei-hai-Wei. That seemed to indicate that Wei-hai-Wei was now being treated as a dockyard port. He understood that the fortifications had been put an end to, and the only establishment there at the present moment was a naval hospital. In the explanation given by the First Lord of the Admiralty it was said that coaling accommodation had been provided at Wei-hai-Wei, but they had not been informed as to that provision. He was aware that the difficulty was that the entrance to Wei-hai-Wei was very broad, and could not be effectively closed against torpedo attacks; and therefore he thought the House ought to be informed with regard to the provision of coaling accommodation at Wei-hai-Wei. He wished to know if any change had come about as to the use which was to be made of that place. The appointment of a King's Harbour Master seemed to indicate something more had been contemplated.

*MR. PRETYMAN said that in regard to the case mentioned by Mr. Kearley he was sorry he had not given notice. The hon. Gentleman mentioned the case some time ago in the Lobby.

MR. KEARLEY: I gave notice to the Civil Lord in writing.

*MR. PRETYMAN said it was impossible to remember for several months the details of a case of this kind. These cases must be dealt with on their merits, and it was impossible to lay down a general rule. Each case was gone into most carefully. There was every desire that an employee should get something, certainly not worse, but slightly better, than he was entitled to under the Act. He was sure the Civil Lord would look into this particular case, and send a report to the hon. Member. With regard to the point raised by the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean the King's Harbour Master there had the control of the whole water area, and he had no special connection with the hospital or the coaling station. The Admiralty were responsible for the berthing of all ships at Wei-hai-Wei whether they were Admiralty ships or other shipping, and therefore it was necessary to appoint a King's Harbour Master and that was the reason why he was appointed. With regard to the coaling station he explained it to the House two years ago. The amount of coal kept at Wei-hai-Wei was 6,000 tons.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE: But this is a new matter this year in the statement of the First Lord accompanying the Estimates.

*MR. PRETYMAN said that was the same matter. He believed that the accommodation had now been completed although it was not completed at the time the statement was issued. There had been no variation from the statement in regard to providing accommodation for 6,000 tons of coal. The question of the hospital was at this moment being considered. The state of affairs in the Far East might altogether change the situation there, and therefore no expenditure at the present moment was being incurred there and the matter had been hung up. He might say, in answer to the definite question of the hon. Gentleman opposite, that no change in the programme already announced was contemplated—namely, two battleships, four armed cruisers, and fourteen destroyers.

Resolution agreed to.

Third Resolution.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON said he was sorry to be under the necessity of addressing the House again, but what he had to say about shipbuilding was more relevant to Section 2 than Section 1. He for one, and the hon. Member for East Perthshire for another, refused to admit that the assent of Parliament had been given to the new construction programme of the year. It had never been discussed. It was put off to another occasion two and a half months ago. He thought it was right that the discussion of the new programme should come late rather than early in the year. They were all agreed that they should abstain from discussing new construction on Sections 1 and 2, and that it should be brought up formally on Section 3. This was the 30th of June, and there was still a month available for discussing the Vote. They were promised a day for that Vote. He was perfectly certain that an opportunity would be afforded to the House for the discussion of the new naval programme, but with the Speaker in the Chair it would be a hopeless failure. It could not be properly discussed except in Committee, when hon. Gentlemen could speak more than once, and when they could be answered as often as might be necessary. He only wanted on this occasion to say that he thought they ought to know something now about the overdue Report of the Boiler Committee. There was a Boiler Committee still sitting dealing with the problem of boilers, and perhaps the hon. Gentleman would tell the Committee whether any Report had been presented, and, if so, whether it would be submitted to the House. He had pressed the hon. Gentleman, by means of Questions addressed to him, several times for the report of the Court of Inquiry into the loss of the Submarine A 1. They had abstained from discussing this matter while the Court was sitting, but the inquiry had now been completed, and he thought the House was entitled to have the report of that Court. If the report was confidential something as a substitute for it ought to be produced. His hon. friend the Member for East Perthshire had alluded to the new class of vessels called scouts. There had been a great deal of alarmist literature appearing lately on the subject, and he thought it might be useful if the hon. Gentleman were to give the House some reassuring declaration as to the fitness of this class of vessel for the purpose for which it was designed.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE said there was no doubt that the Report of the Boiler Committee had been in the hands of the Admiralty for a considerable time, and there was no reason why it should not have been published at least a month ago. It had been stated, not in the authorised quarters, but in that portion of the Press which dealt with naval questions, that there was considerable difference of opinion in the Admiralty as to the best class of boiler to adopt. It had been said that as the result of the trials which had taken place the new First Sea Lord took a wholly different view from that taken by the Controller of the Navy, though he did not in the least believe that there was any foundation for that statement. As the statement had been made, and as the Report of the Boiler Committee had been ready for a considerable time, it would be wise to give to the House the authorised opinions of those gentlemen, and if necessary a note from the Admiralty themselves on that Report, because all sorts of unauthorised stories were going about. The friends of each class of boilers had their say, and all this could be put an end to by the publication of the Report.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said the introduction of the new class of scouts was the most important departure the Government had taken for many a long day. He asked for information in regard to the new vessels. If they were successful they would entirely obviate the necessity of subsidising the merchant fleet. They were contrived and designed for the sole purpose of replacing the merchant cruisers—the Cunarders—but, as the right hon. Gentleman had said, very considerable doubt had been thrown upon one of their most important features, namely, their area of action. An article in The Times had raised the doubt, though he believed that it was an absurdly exaggerated article. Certainly the alarmist tone adopted was not in the least justified by the facts. The scout vessels had been represented to be practically useless in carrying sufficient coal for any area of action necessary for a scouting vessel. Personally, he had great hopes of the vessel, though it would be well if the Admiralty would give the House a reassuring account of the scout class of vessel so as to dispel the deep suspicion which had been cast upon it by The Times article. He had advocated the adoption of oil fuel for the Navy for the last dozen years. He believed that there was a large amount of oil fuel in the country, and he understood that an experiment with this fuel had been carried out. Was the Admiralty satisfied that there were adequate supplies of oil fuel in this country? In his opinion oil fuel doubled the area of action of ships, and it was no exaggeration to say that it was worth twice as much to a ship as coal. The consideration for the Navy was whether we could have a sufficient supply of oil fuel in this country. He believed we could. The Estimates contained a sum amounting to over £2,000,000 for coal in the dockyards. Was it the practice of the Admiralty when foreign war vessels entered our ports to allow them to take in a supply of coal, or were the foreign war vessels referred to the private trader? Care had to be exercised in this matter for fear of creating a breach of the laws of neutrality in helping what might possibly be a belligerent vessel. Was a condition enforced upon such vessels to the effect that the coal would only be used to allow the vessels to go back to their own ports and not for belligerent purposes?

Mr. PRETYMAN said that the idea of building these scouts was that they should have equal speed but a greater radius of action than destroyers; and, therefore, they would avoid the necessity of any Admiral commanding a fleet using destroyers for purely scouting purposes when they were required for other purposes. That was the real origin of these scouting ships. Eight of them were being built. The purpose for which these vessels had been specially designed was to accompany a fleet and clear out the smaller craft which might endanger the safety of the fleet. It was not intended to lay down any more of this class until the value of the eight now under construction had been actually tested. The hon. Member for King's Lynn had referred to an article in The Times in which the figures quoted were considerably overdrawn. The whole gravamen of that article was in respect of the coal supply, but there was a mistake in the figures quoted, viz., that when these vessels were steaming at their normal draught they would be only carrying 150 tons of coal. That was not the fact. The draught which was imposed at their trials required them to carry sufficient coal to steam 3,000 miles at a speed of ten knots, and the quantity would vary slightly in different vessels. These vessels were not designed by the Admiralty. They had been frequently told that it was thought desirable to give an opportunity to eminent private naval draughtsmen to design ships for the Royal Navy and give them a free hand. In this particular case the private firms in this country had been given that opportunity provided that they could fulfil the particular requirements as to speed and radius of action. They were permitted to send in their own specifications and designs, and the result was the eight vessels were now under construction. Four firms were building them—two each. Messrs. Armstrong; Vickers; Fairfield; and Cammell, Laird and Company. Each of these vessels fulfilled the requirements of the Admiralty, although there were certain variations in the coal-bunker capacity. The largest capacity was 600 tons, which was considerably more than was indicated in The Times article. He joined issue with the hon. Member in his statement that a third-class cruiser would be a better vessel for the purpose for which these vessels were designed. The cost of a scout was very much the same as a third-class cruiser, which could only proceed at the rate of twenty-two knots an hour, but which had a more powerful armament. In the case of the scout they had the extra speed and so they had to sacrifice something in the way of armament. The purpose of the scout was that it should be able to approach an enemy's fleet consisting of a number of swift cruisers, and be able to escape and return and give information to the Admiral Commanding-in-Chief. It was perfectly clear that a third-class cruiser armament would give her no advantage, because she would not be able to fight a swift first or second-class cruiser of the enemy's fleet, and therefore her armament in that particular respect would be wasted, while the extra three-knots speed of the scout would be far more useful for the particular purpose he had indicated. The Admiralty had never claimed, and did not now claim, that these scouts would be fit for ocean work. They were fitted specially for Mediterranean work, and would be useful also for Channel work within the compass of their radius of action. But they were not designed for long-distance ocean work. It was not pretended that they were designed to accompany a fleet across the Atlantic. What it came to was this—that they were costly vessels, perhaps, but that they were the cheapest vessels and the smallest which could steam twenty-five knots for eight hours in succession; and that really was the problem set to the designers of the private firms. At the same time, they could steam 3,000 miles at the rate of ten knots an hour. When these eight scouts had been tested at sea, they would then be in a position to decide whether they ought to ask the House to vote money for more of them.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES asked if he was right in saying that while at ten knots the scouts could steam 3,000 miles, at twenty-five knots they could steam only 200 miles.

*MR. PRETYMAN said that 3,000 miles at ten knots was limited by coal capacity, and twenty-five knots for eight hours was not limited by coal capacity. The limit was that of the engine power. The scouts could not steam twenty-five knots an hour for more than eight hours without some relaxation of the strain on the machinery. The destroyers could steam only twenty-five knots an hour for not more than four hours.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES asked if the scouts could steam twenty-five knots for eight hours, and then, after being eased down, steam another twenty-five knots.

*MR. PRETYMAN: Certainly. With regard to the inquiry into the loss of Submarine A1 he understood a statement was desired on a subsequent Vote.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE said that the House was promised very definitely that there should be a general statement, not only a statement with reference to the loss of Submarine A1.

*MR. PRETYMAN said he would be perfectly prepared to make a statement; but he thought it could be made with better effect on a future occasion.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON asked if the report of the inquiry would be issued.

*MR. PRETYMAN said he was afraid he could not promise the hon. Gentleman the report of the inquiry. On principle such reports were not published. As to the Boiler Committee, the Admiralty had received an interim Report, and the final Report was daily expected. He was glad to be able to assure the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Forest of Dean that he heard no suggestion of any difference of opinion within the Admiralty or among distinguished naval officers outside the Admiralty with regard to the matter. As to oil fuel, it was a most important question, to which the Admiralty had for some time been devoting a great deal of attention. It was a question, however, which in the interests of the Navy he would not deal with at any great length. He would, however, refer to two points. If a supply could be obtained from within the British Empire, which would be accessible in war time, then he thought the requirements would be met. The point, however, was not as to whether a supply was or was not in the British Empire, but whether the supply would be available both in peace and war, and whether they should be able to develop in peace time supplies that would be available in time of war. He could inform the hon. Gentleman that there was a prospect, certainly a possibility, of such a supply being obtained. That was the point of view from which the matter was being considered by the Admiralty. The hon. Gentleman said that oil fuel would double the radius of action; but he did not wish the House to accept that statement as being endorsed by the Admiralty. There were many advantages in the use of oil fuel; but one point should not be lost sight of, and that was that coal was abundant and obtainable in all quarters of the globe; and until oil was equally available it would be impossible to rely upon it solely for fuel. If the experiments in oil which were now being made by the Admiralty were successful, and if adequate supplies of oil were available, no doubt the proper arrangement would be the use of coal and oil in combination as fuel. In that way a considerable amount of labour in the stokehole would be avoided. With regard to the supply of coal by the Admiralty to foreign warships, as a general rule foreign warships obtained their supplies from the ordinary merchants of the port. But if the Admiralty were desired for a special reason, and as a matter of courtesy and convenience, to supply coal to a warship of another Power, they would consider the application on its merits. It would only be granted under exceptional circumstances and with the most careful safeguards.

MR. BUCHANAN said that the House was indebted to the hon. Gentleman for his statement, which justified the criticisms which had been advanced. If the Admiralty were engaged in totally novel experiments, they ought to be conducted on a limited scale; and should not involve the country in more expense than was absolutely necessary. Hon. Gentlemen opposite always asked if the House was going to refuse expenditure on the Navy. They did not want to refuse expenditure; but they wanted to know whether it was necessary or not. He gathered that the scouts were something between a third-class cruiser and a destroyer; and that they cost about the same as a third-class cruiser, and three times as much as a destroyer. The Admiralty might be justified in making these experiments, but in common prudence they should not have embarked on a scheme necessitating the building of eight ships, but have contented themselves with experimenting with two or, at the outside, three vessels. He did not pretend to follow the whole subject, but the way it came home to the laymen of the House like himself was that it was of little use for these ships to go at a speed of twenty knots from Gibraltar to Malta, if having done that they had not sufficient coal to come back. It was quite clear that at the present moment the Admiralty were in doubt as to whether this experiment was going to be successful or not. In his opinion, under the circumstances, the House was justified in watching very narrowly any new departure made by the Admiralty having regard to the consequences involved.

[Mr. Jeffreys (Hampshire, N.) in the Chair.]

Class I.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £35,500, be granted to His Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1905, for Expenditure in respect of Royal Palaces."

Mr. WHITLEY (Halifax) said when this Vote was under consideration before he raised the question of excessive expenditure with regard to it. On that occasion the noble Lord succeeded in talking out his own Vote, and it was for the purpose of giving the noble Lord an opportunity of making the statement which he did not then make that he (Mr. Whitley) now proposed to move to reduce the Vote by a sum of £5,000. The expenditure on the Royal Palaces after the King came into residence and the Prince of Wales came to Marlborough House was necessary, as every one would admit, but there was no reason for making it an annual expenditure. He contended that £40,000 was far too large an amount for maintenance and repairs, and he begged to move a reduction of £5,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £30,500, be granted for the said service."—(Mr. Whitley).

Mr. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) said as we had a Sovereign and all the appurtenances of Royalty we must behave handsomely to the King and all that belonged to him. There was no more rigid economist than himself, and he had on many occasions attacked Votes and had succeeded in getting them reduced, but if there was one item in the whole category of expenditure in this country that ought to be agreed to it was the item now before the Committee. The sum was really a very small one upon which to keep up the state of magnificence befitting a country with a Royal Sovereign, and he could not understand the hesitation in voting the money. No doubt there were items in regard to which economies might be effected, but that was a matter to be discussed on the salary of the First Commissioner of Works, who was responsible for any improprieties or extravagances in the Votes, and when the proper occasion arrived he would be prepared to express his opinion of the gentleman at the head of that Department and of the noble Lord so far as the Rules of the House would allow.

Mr. BUCHANAN (Perthshire, E.) asked whether the works at Holyrood had been completed and whether the Palace was now fit for a human being to live in. A certain amount of money had been spent, and it was desirable that the Committee should be assured that it had been wisely spent, so that in the event of the King again visiting Scotland there would be no obstacle in the way of his occupying Holyrood Palace.

Mr. CALDWELL (Lanarkshire, Mid.) pointed out that last year the Vote for Holyrood Palace came to £6,000, and this year it was £2,600. It was obvious, he thought, from that fact that as Holyrood was a very old Palace and one which the King intended to occupy when in Scotland, that the amount of money spent upon it was absolutely inadequate for the purpose of putting the Palace into anything like a proper condition for occupation and for the entertainment and so forth connected with the Court. Speaking of the Vote generally, he thought it ought to be remembered that during the last year or two there had been a larger expenditure on the Palaces in consequence of the accession of the King. It was not, therefore, fair to contrast the figures of the present year with those of recent years. He thought, however, that some explanation should be given of the £1,000 for wine cellars at St. James's Palace.

Mr. TOMKINSON (Cheshire, Crewe) asked for an explanation of the large expenditure proposed on the Royal kitchen gardens at Windsor.

Lord BALCARRES (Lancashire, Chorley) said the sum proposed to be spent on the kitchen gardens at Windsor was doubtless unusually large, but it was for the carrying out of new works and improvements which ought really to have been effected during the last twenty years. With regard to the £1,000 for wine cellars at St. James's Palace, as there were at present no wine cellars at Buckingham Palace, all the wine was kept at St. James's Palace, and it was considered absolutely necessary that the wine cellars there, which were extremely ill-fitted and ill-constructed, should be improved. As to the complaint brought by the hon. Member for Halifax, the charge of extravagance was of a very general character, and therefore it was possible to give only a very general reply. It was said that the cost of maintenance and repairs was especially extravagant, but he did not think that £40,000 was an excessive expenditure. On the contrary, he believed it was very moderate, considering the scale of magnificence and the number of the Royal Palaces which had to be maintained. Moreover, it had to be remembered that a number of the Palaces had altogether ceased to be residences of the Sovereign, and had become nothing more nor less than places of pleasure and public resort. Hampton Court, for instance, cost £6,000 a year for maintenance and repairs, an insignificant sum considering the amount of profit and pleasure the public deprived from it. As showing how it was appreciated, he mentioned that the picture galleries alone were last year visited by 620,000 people, while the National Gallery, which was right in the heart of London, was only visited by 457,000 during the same period. Hampton Court had long ceased to be a Royal residence, and as one of the most beautiful and interesting buildings in Europe the expenditure upon it would not be grudged. The repairs and drainage at Holyrood were concluded, and an independent authority had pronounced the building to be in a sound habitable condition. It could not be justly said that Holyrood was starved, and should His Majesty have occasion to take up his residence there some improvements in furnishing would be all that would be required. Last year the sum spent at Holyrood was larger than the sum spent at Buckingham Palace. This year they were spending £2,600 there as compared with £4,000 at Buckingham Palace.

Mr. JOHN BURNS (Battersea) appealed to the noble Lord not only to bear in mind the observations of the hon. Member for King's Lynn, with which he entirely agreed in regard to the Royal Palaces, but also to remember that there ought to be some differentiation between Royal Palaces in the personal occupancy of the Crown and the other Royal Palaces which frequently sheltered themselves behind His Majesty's Privy Purse and the Civil List. His Majesty ought to have an inclusive sum to spend in whatever way he pleased. He was in favour of equal rights for all white men, and the House of Commons had no right to intrude into the private affairs of anybody high or low. He thought the item of £6,000 for Hampton Court Palace gave good value to the public, but he would like to know what the £1,350 for new works was for. It might be for new bicycle sheds for the pensioned tenants at Hampton Court, or it might be for new and ornate outhouses for keeping petroleum for their motor-cars and lamps. He did not think that His Majesty ought to be debited with what was put up for the convenience of the tenants. Until they differentiated between Royal Palaces and ex-Royal Palaces occupied by officials and pensioned tenants they could never have economy, because these people sheltered themselves behind the general designation of Royal Palace and that disarmed criticism. There was also a sum of £2,080 for new works, alterations, and additions at St. James's Palace. If that was spent upon State rooms he did not mind, but he wanted to know how much of it was spent upon official residences. He knew the average official pretty well, and he generally fastened himself on to a public building, first in two rooms, then probably in four, five, six, and ten rooms; then he managed to appropriate part of the Royal garden as a lawn and another piece for a tennis court. At Hampton Court great golf courses were being laid out and had been used for years for this purpose and they spoiled the beauty of the view.

He came now to another point the Lord Chamberlain's residence, in respect of which there was a charge of £300. Here was a point for fair criticism. The charge was for raising the height of bedrooms in the cottage of one of the officials in residence, and that struck him as being an unreasonable amount; but because it was bracketed with the £40,000 for Royal Palaces, they were prevented from giving it that criticism which it deserved. He would suggest that in future Estimates they should get a statement of the charges for Royal Palaces and gardens proper, and for ex-Royal Palaces; and further, that the expenditure proposed to be incurred in connection with officials who did not belong to the personal entourage of the King and Queen should be entirely separate. If that were done, they would be able to criticise the various accounts submitted to them. He thought Hampton Court Palace was more beautiful than Fontainebleau. The Palace and gardens were the most beautiful in Europe, but he was convinced that scores of thousands of pounds had been spent on that Palace in the last forty or fifty years in carrying out the whims, fads, and transient caprices of the tenants in residence, and the House of Commons ought to put a stop to that kind of expenditure. The noble Lord deserved credit for the way in which he had severely jumped on some of the tenants, and prevented them from vandalising that beautiful structure. These officers and tenants had had too big a dip into the Treasury purse, and the time had arrived when that should be resisted and restricted. The only way in which it could be restricted and economy secured was to differentiate the different items in the Estimates in future so that they would be able to bring criticism to bear where it was due.

MR. WHITLEY asked leave to withdraw the Amendment

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £69,100, be granted to His Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1905, for the Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens."

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said he wanted to make a claim for the extension of the ride in Hyde Park into Kensington Gardens. The present arrangement had become a matter of very great discredit to the capital. The ride in Hyde Park was so short and inadequate that it really did not by any means fulfil the purposes of such a ride in a metropolis like this. Years ago, he was informed, it was customary for riders to ride in Kensington Gardens along the broad avenue of trees where nobody was ever to be found—not so much as a nursery-maid or a baby, and where, consequently, riders might go without doing any injury to anybody. There was a very strong feeling among riders in the Park, who were numbered by thousands, that they had never been properly treated by the First Commissioner of Works or this House. This was not a trifling matter. The sum expended on the Row was extremely small, and he thought the House ought to be generous in regard to it. There was no difficulty except in the matter of money. He could get a petition signed by hundreds and thousands of people, but he should prefer to leave this to the intelligence of the noble Lord. The ride really required extension. Even the ride that existed was in a discreditable condition. They trusted that at last they had now found in the noble Lord a generous and appreciative spirit who would give them the boon which they had so long desired.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton) said the hon. Member for Lynn Regis was too young to remember the circumstances in connection with this matter. When the Great Exhibition of 1851 was built in Hyde Park, riders, as a concession, were allowed to ride in a certain portion of Kensington Gardens. The reason why this was done away with was that the nursery-maids found it somewhat difficult to look after their charges and enjoy the flirtations of military people. They got Members of the House of Commons to plead their case, and this House was so very gallant to the nursery-maids that riders were deprived of their right to go into Kensington Gardens. He did not see why they should not be allowed to ride into Kensington Gardens. In the Bois de Boulogne there were forty miles of a ride. Riding up and down the Row must be very dull work, even if the riders were admired by the people who came to look at them. If the noble Lord could come to some arrangement with the nursery-maids everybody would think it desirable that riders should be allowed to go into Kensington Gardens.

MR. TENNANT (Berwickshire) called attention to the condition of the roads in St. James's Park and Hyde Park. The surface of the roads from Storey's Gate to St. James's Palace was very discreditable. The surface of the roads from St. James's Palace, and from Buckingham Palace up Constitution Hill to Hyde Park Corner, and even in Hyde Park itself, was in holes, and the effect must be to wear out the tyres of carriages in a most extraordinary manner.

Resolution to be reported upon Monday next; Committee also report Progress; to sit again this evening.

TYNESIDE TRAMWAYS AND TRAMROADS BILL [LORDS] (BY ORDER.)

Order for Consideration, as amended, read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill, as amended, be now considered."

*SIR JAMES WOODHOUSE (Huddersfield) asked the House to reconsider the decision which had been arrived at by the Committee upstairs in regard to the Bill. He was conscious of the reluctance which the House always felt to reconsider the decisions of its Committees, but under special circumstances, and when those decisions involved a far-reaching issue beyond anything affecting the particular locality primarily interested in the Bill, it had constantly been the habit of the House to ask for such reconsideration. The Bill before the House did involve such far-reaching issues, which the municipalities of the country regarded as of very serious importance to the interests of the ratepayers and the public generally. It would probably be urged that it would have been more proper and convenient to raise the question on the Order for the Second Reading, and he did not deny that that would have been better; but the only object which the Newcastle Corporation authorities had in abstaining was consideration for the time of the House, together with a belief that the Committee would not give the powers sought for. The hon. Member went on to describe the systems of the Newcastle Corporation and the Tyneside Tramways Company, by whom the present measure was being promoted, and explained that the Corporation had a double track of twenty-three miles, with one mile and a quarter of single track. There were 170 cars in actual use, and about twenty building. Over £1,250,000 of capital had been expended, 38,500,000 passengers were annually being carried, and the car mileage was nearly 4,000,000, while the rate of expenditure to receipts was about 65 per cent. That was the position of the corporation tramways. The company's system was three and a half miles of double track and five and a half miles of single track. The number of cars was twenty-two, the capital expended £135,000; and the number of passengers carried annually was 2,500,000, and the rate of expenditure in proportion to receipts was 90 per cent. Those were the respective positions of the corporation and the Tyneside company, and what the latter sought to do by the Bill was to connect up its system at its western boundary with the eastern boundary of the corporation on each of two routes, known as the higher and the lower, so as to form one continuous system, and similarly to extend the Gosforth system in the north.

Of course, the Committee upstairs no doubt had desired to know, as that House would desire to know, what was the grievance which the Tyneside company had, and what case they could make out, to induce Parliament to give them the running powers which they sought over the twenty-three miles of the corporation tramway system, over eleven miles of which the Committee had actually recommended that such powers should be granted. It was specially necessary that a good case should be made out, because on the one hand, they had a private dividend-earning company, and on the other they had the fact that the running powers sought were over a system maintained by the ratepayers of Newcastle. Of course, it was agreed that a case of public necessity must be made out in order to induce Parliament to agree to such an extraordinary use of the corporation system as the granting of compulsory running powers over it by a private company. It was said that the grievance of the public, which the company sought to remedy, was that there was a large population at Wallsend, just beyond the corporation system terminus, but upon the company's own evidence it could not be denied that of the travelling public not more than one-fifth got into the company's cars on arriving at the city boundaries. It went without saying that everyone would like to travel from point to point by a through route, but a great city like Newcastle, in the regulation of its tramway system, had to consider what was practicable with regard to through routes. It was given in evidence in this case that the best use possible had been made of through routes from the far west to the far east. It was impossible to give the convenience sought by the company without dislocating or upsetting the existing system and inconveniencing hundreds of thousands for the purpose of obliging the few passengers who lived in or travelled from or beyond Wallsend. It was proposed that there should be alternate cars, but the company's cars were not to run further west than the centre of the city, so that the through route would be turned from an eight-minute into a sixteen-minute service. What was the public demand for the Bill? He had sought in vain to find more than the petitions of fifty-five manufacturers concerned in Tyneside industries, a large number of whom are interested in the company. It was said they represented 27,000 workmen, but the evidence of these workmen themselves was all the other way. The local authorities, who represented two-thirds of the 100,000 population served by the company, were either opposed or were neutral. Only the Wallsend local authority was in favour of it, and many of its members were interested in the company. The effect of establishing the principle of granting compulsory running powers of this kind would be very far-reaching and would not be confined to the locality. It was as the spokesman of a unanimous meeting of the representatives of the municipalities of the country that he asked to send the Bill back for further consideration by the Committee. There was no precedent for granting compulsory powers of this kind, except under very special circumstances. The case of the Bournemouth tramways was referred to before the Committee as a precedent for granting these compulsory powers, but it was a very exceptional case. He invited the House to consider what had happened in that case, because it illustrated the danger to which municipalities would be exposed if these powers were granted by Parliament. In the Bournemouth case a light railway was stated to be in course of promotion from Christchurch to Poole, running through Bournemouth. The Bournemouth Corporation opposed the scheme because they said the roads through Bournemouth were not suitable for it, and the result was that powers to run through Bournemouth were refused. Bournemouth in the following year came to Parliament and asked for power to construct a tramway system over the very roads on which the Light Railway Commission had decided that it was impossible to construct tramways; and the Committee, regarding the action of the corporation as something in the nature of a breach of faith, granted the company running powers over the proposed lines. What happened? Bournemouth having got the tramways, and the private company having got the running powers, which, by the way, they had never exercised, the company was now making a claim against the corporation, which had gone to arbitration, for £50,000 in respect of these running powers. Compensation for licences was not in it with that sort of procedure. It, however, had opened the eyes of the municipalities of the country, and it was for that reason that they appealed to Parliament to protect them against the mulcting of the ratepayers of the country by private companies for compensation, and against enhancing the value of private undertakings in this way at the public expense. Precisely the same thing might be done in this case of Newcastle without any warrant. He asked that the Bill should be reconsidered in the light of these facts, and he hoped that the Committee presided over by the hon. Member for South Somerset might be able, without infringing the principle for which he was contending, to arrive at some mutually satisfactory arrangement. It was for that reason that, instead of meeting the Bill with a direct negative, he asked that it should be reconsidered. He was perfectly satisfied that the corporation of Newcastle-on-Tyne had endeavoured to meet the public convenience in this matter, because they had proposed to run their cars right through to the centre of Wallsend, and in order to obviate any further inconvenience they had offered to give the benefit of the whole fares received for the last half mile, which was on the company's system, to the company. There was no doubt that if compulsory running powers were given to this company they would enormously enhance the value of their undertaking.

*SIR WALTER PLUMMER (Newcastle-on-Tyne) said that, in seconding the Motion, he believed that under present circumstances the time of Parliament could not be better occupied than in the discussion of this important question. A great principle was at stake, viz., the principle of compulsory powers as distinguished from voluntary agreement. It was true that Newcastle was at the present moment only concerned, but he was convinced that if this Bill passed in its present form, there was no other city in the country which would be safe from similar inroads. It was not a question whether two different tramway systems should have power to arrange through traffic, but whether one system should have compulsory powers over another, notwithstanding the great difference between them in regard to mileage and capital expenditure. The capital expenditure on the corporation tramway system was seven times greater than that of the private company, the car mileage was eight times greater, the number of cars was eight times greater, the amount of receipts was ten times greater. For the year ending 25th June the corporation system of tramways had carried 40,000,000 passengers and the cars had travelled over 4,000,000 miles. He quoted these figures because he was aware that a good deal would be heard in the course of the discussion about the convenience of the public; but care should be taken to suit the convenience of the majority of the public and not sacrifice that to the convenience of the minority. He believed in the greatest good for the greatest number. He ventured to contend that neither the company nor the corporation had started their tramway systems in a purely philanthropic spirit. They were started, as most things were in this material world, because it was believed that the tramways would pay. Certainly he knew that the ratepayers of Newcastle would never have sanctioned the expenditure of £1,100,000 from purely philanthropic motives, or unless they believed that they would retain full control over the system, and not be compelled to allow a private company to use their streets and lines. Different views were held with regard to municipalisation. He was one of those who had voted against the municipalisation of these tramways, but he felt that once the system was sanctioned, it was his duty loyally to endeavour to make it a success. It was because they believed that that success depended upon the corporation having full control of the streets and of their own tramways, that they felt so keenly this invasion by a private company. It seemed to him that the value of municipalisation would be reduced to a minimum if, after the corporation of Newcastle-on-Tyne had spent over a million sterling upon their tramways, they were compelled to admit small private companies to use their system. The Bill dealt with east and north of Newcastle, but if once it was established, a similar company would soon approach them from the west, while the tramway systems of every other city in the kingdom would be imperilled. From the point of view of the public convenience they had offered to run their cars out to Wallsend, the chief centre of population, and to erect there, at the point of junction of the two systems, a comfortable waiting room for the small number of passengers who would want to continue their journey further east. He did not believe that Parliament would compel the 'bus proprietors of the metropolis to establish through routes everywhere. The thing was impracticable. Yet every day hundreds of thousands of people had to change twice or three times in order to get to and from their places of business and their residences. The question of public inconvenience had been magnified out of all proportion to its true value. The corporation of Newcastle had offered to extend their services on the two main routes, to deal with exceptional traffic during race meetings, and to make arrangements for extending the line a half mile east at Wallsend. If the Bill was re-committed they were willing to renew these offers. He was convinced that if the principle in the Bill was sanctioned, it would strike a serious blow at local self-government, and injuriously affect the prosperity and progress of the great municipalities.

"To leave out all the words after the word 'Bill,' and add the words 'be re-committed to the former Committee in respect of Clauses 15 and 16.'"—(Sir James Woodhouse.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

*SIR EDWARD STRACHEY (Somersetshire,S.) said that as Chairman of the Committee which had considered the Bill, he ventured to think that his hon. friends had not approached this subject on any other ground than that of principle; but it was rather late in the day to raise the question of principle after the Bill had passed through the other House, and now came back to the Commons practically for Third Reading, without such principle being raised before. His hon. friend the Member for Huddersfield had asked, on various grounds, that the Bill should be referred back to the Committee. The Committee of this House had declined to give a roving commission to the tramways company, and had struck out the facilities clause which had been passed by the Lords, and had only given the company running powers over a portion of the Newcastle corporation tramways. The hon. Member for Huddersfield said that there was a great distinction between a private tramway company and a corporation. He could not understand what the hon. Member meant by that. The hon. Member seemed to think that it was a right thing for the corporation to carry on a tramway for the benefit of the corporation and a wrong thing for a private company to carry on a tramway for its own benefit so long as it was to the public advantage that they should do so. His hon. friend was connected with private companies, and surely he must think that it was legitimate to make profit out of these private companies. The Newcastle corporation said they did not care about profit, but all that they desired was to do what they liked with their own. It was stated before the Committee that one of the objections to the tramway company was that they allowed advertisements to be placed in their cars, while the corporation sacrificed £4,000 or £5,000 by prohibiting advertisements in their cars, showing that the interests of the ratepayers was not considered in working the trams. When vested interests were talked about, it seemed to him that it was the vested interests of a great corporation which were in question—a corporation which said that they did not want to give facilities of travelling to the public at large by allowing others to invade their sacred grounds. In the old days the great agricultural landlords use to say that they would not allow the amenities of their estates to be interfered with by railways running through their estates, but Parliament compelled them. The sole point of view from which the Committee acted was that the one thing to be considered was, not the susceptibilities of the corporation or whether it would be profitable to the company to run their cars over the lines of the corporation, but whether it was to the interest of the travelling public. The question they had to consider was whether it would be convenient to the working men going to their work and returning to their homes, that there should be a system of through cars from one centre to another. The Committee over which he had the honour to preside was perfectly impartial and acted entirely from a judicial point of view in the public interest.

He was rather surprised that the senior Member for Newcastle should have referred to the manufacturers as he did. Surely the manufacturers had a right to be considered. It was in their interest as well as in the interest of their men that the men should be brought to their work as easily and as cheaply as possible. It had been said that they had had evidence from the trade unions against the Bill. That was quite true; but they had evidence also from working men — whether they were members of trade unions or not he did not know, but they, unlike the trades union witnesses, live outside the corporation area—who maintained that it would be a great convenience to them if these running powers were granted. He noticed that the trades unions of Newcastle had issued a circular to the House in which they stated that the Bill would rob them of their one successful municipal enterprise. He had the greatest sympathy with trade unions, and as a rule supported their demands in this House, and he could not help sympathising with the Newcastle trade unions who had apparently suffered so much from municipal mismanagement and misgovernment and who naturally supported their one successful municipal enterprise. The Bournemouth precedent did not enter into the minds of his Committee at all; but if his hon. friend asked that the Bill should be re-committed in order that a clause should be inserted that any increase of value from these running powers should not be taken into account he would be prepared to agree as he was opposed to such unearned increment. His hon. friend said that many men who broke the journey did not get into the tramcars again. There were two reasons for that. One was that if a man was near his home he did not think it worth while to enter another tramcar. The other was that the tramway company made a mistake in charging a penny instead of a halfpenny. It was suggested that the Bill should be referred back to the Committee to see if they could not get the two parties to agree to some compromise. The question would never have come before the House if a compromise had been possible. It would be more reasonable to suggest that the Bill should not be read a third time until the parties had themselves arrived at a satisfactory compromise. It did not influence the minds of the Committee that this was going to be made a test question

—a question of a municipality against a private concern. He very much regretted it was being dragged from being a local matter into a national matter. The Committees both of the House of Commons and the House of Lords were unanimously of opinion that it was desirable that running powers should be given. No doubt it would have been better if those powers could have been obtained by agreement instead of compulsion. An attempt to arrive at an agreement made in 1902 failed owing to the attitude of the corporation tramways committee. On that occasion, the chairman and vice-chairman of the committee who were in favour of running powers being given were beaten by only one vote and they resigned their positions. His hon. friend stated that the corporation was quite prepared to take over the most paying part of the company's line; but that was an offer to which the company would not agree. It was said that if running powers were given it would lead to the dislocation of the entire system; but his Committee, after careful consideration, did not agree with the statement, and it was provided that the regulations, conditions, and terms under which the running powers were to be exercised should be sanctioned and controlled by the Board of Trade, and that the Board of Trade should have power to appoint an arbitrator to settle such regulations, conditions, and terms if necessary. It had also been said that the company's employees would not observe the regulations of the corporation; but the Board of Trade had ample power with reference to that; and, as a matter of fact, the servants of the company would be, to all intents and purposes, the servants of the corporation while working within their area. He asked the House to consider whether it was wise to decline to accept the decision arrived at by Committees of both Houses and to decide that facilities should not be given which were to afford great masses of population means of being taken out easily and quickly from large centres to the country districts. He approved of municipal trading; but on the other hand he wanted to see it carried out on sane and Imperial lines and not from the narrow and parochial point of view urged that night. He therefore resisted the Amendment.

Mr. HUGH SMITH (Northumberland, Tyneside) said that he formerly supported the corporation in the municipalisation of the tramways. Now he supported the company and the Bill. His constituency was rather mixed in opinion upon this matter. Three distinct authorities had presented petitions in favour of the Bill, and another was opposed to it. Employers of labour, representing 27,000 workmen, had sent a petition in favour of the Bill, but it was said they did not really represent the opinion of the workmen. He was, however, perfectly satisfied in his own mind that the workmen did not care whether it was by the tramway of the corporation or of the company which had compulsory running powers, by which they travelled, so long as they could get to Wallsend. The whole question related to about 600 yards of tramway line which separated the corporation tramway from the centre of Wallsend. Many attempts had been made by the corporation to obtain powers to run a tramway to Wallsend. There were no less than four attempts to arrive at a compromise between the corporation and the company; but they were abortive. The first attempt was in 1903; and a quasi agreement was then drawn up. The tramway committee declined to discuss it, and it was thrown out. The second attempt was in 1904. Altogether, four unsuccessful attempts had been made by the company to come to an amicable agreement with the corporation. The Bill was considered for three days by the House of Lords Committee and for four days by the Committee of this House, and now the Motion for the rejection of the measure, which had stood on the Paper for some days, had suddenly been replaced by a Motion for re-committal. He submitted that if the principle was one of the enormous importance alleged, it ought to have been dealt with on the Second Reading. If the Motion were carried there would be another deadlock, as the parties interested were not at one in any way whatever. He welcomed the speech of the hon. Member for Huddersfield, in which the hope was held out that if the Bill were recommitted some arrangement might be come to whereby mutual running powers would be granted.

*SIR JAMES WOODHOUSE said he had simply suggested that the House should not be committed to the principle until it had been inquired into by a Committee, and that in the meantime in this case, as had been done in many other cases, running powers might be arranged by mutual agreement.

MR. HUGH SMITH understood the hon. Member to suggest that there was a likelihood of that being done.

*SIR JAMES WOODHOUSE said he did not represent the Newcastle Corporation. He had taken the matter up on public grounds, in the interests of municipalities generally.

MR. HUGH SMITH asked why there had been all this waste of time and money if there was any chance of a compromise being arrived at? The working classes were to be penalised because they happened to work outside the city boundaries. In days gone by, cities of refuge used to be established for those who had broken the law, but by this Motion there would be set up all over the country cities of privilege, which reminded one not of the twentieth century, but of the middle ages. He earnesly hoped the corporation and the company would come together, so as to avoid what would in the future unquestionably be a grievous disadvantage to the whole community.

MR. BENN (Devonport), in supporting the Motion of the hon. Member for Huddersfield, said the Committee had considered the matter purely from the parochial point of view, and if its decision were upheld an important alteration would have been made in the tramway law of the Kingdom. By the Tramway Act of 1870 the local authority was supreme in regard to tramways within its district, but under the decision of the Committee the municipality would be displaced from that position. He asked the House to consider the question from the London point of view. There was no foundation for the suggestion that the London County Council proposed to exploit the Home counties in tramways matters; they had made, however, and were making, amicable arrangements with their neighbours for running powers which would conduce to the best interests of the public, but they would strongly object to any compulsion. The tramway policy of the London County Council differed considerably from that of any tramway company. Companies very properly aimed at the earning of dividends; the London County Council wisely adopted the policy of pooling all tramway profits so that the money earned in the lucrative districts could be devoted to the establishment of tramways in those localities where trams preceded population. If the principle of this Bill obtained, that beneficent policy would be seriously interfered with. The London County Council system was touched by tramway companies at fifteen points, and if the decision of the Committee were upheld the municipal authority would be bombarded with applications for the admission of companies. How would the selection be made? How would it be possible to secure equal rights for all tramway companies surrounding London? Any such proposal was simply impossible. Moreover, this incursion of tramway companies would seriously interfere with the profit-earning capacity of the municipality. In connection with the Bill under consideration, a suggestion was made for getting over that difficulty. According to the documents circulated by the company, the terms of user were to be left, failing agreement, to the Board of Trade, and the company had offered in Committee that each side should take the net profits earned on its own lines. On the face of it that seemed a reasonable proposition, but what would really happen was that the cars of the company would occupy the place of municipal cars on the lines within the municipality, and if the trade of the town sufficed only for one service of cars the earnings per car-mile would obviously be seriously reduced. Further, were the companies to use the power provided by the municipality for its own scheme? If so, that would raise considerable difficulty. In London, for instance, the London County Council were erecting generating stations for supplying its own service, and it would be able to supply power for these outside companies only by displacing cars of its own. He was not at all opposed to proper arrangements being made for running powers on the border of the city. If a municipality and a corporation could not agree a sufficient remedy already existed, inasmuch as a November election would speedily set matters right in the event of the adoption of an unreasonable attitude by the local authority. A great principle was involved in this Bill. Up to the present Parliament had jealously guarded the rights of municipalities in this respect, and he submitted that if the decision of the Committee were upheld it would be a disastrous thing for the municipalities of the country, and would do much to prevent the travelling public at large obtaining those facilities to which they were entitled.

THE PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY TO THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. BONAR LAW, Glasgow, Blackfriars) said it was not intended to make this a Government question. It was not usual to treat private Bills as Party matters, and no exception to the usual practice would be made on the present occasion. The question, however, had excited much interest in the country, and the House would naturally expect the Government Department which had control of tramway matters to have a definite opinion on the subject and to express it. The Government had a definite opinion on the matter, and he would, as briefly but as strongly as he could, express it. There appeared to be an entire misapprehension as to the issue before the House. From certain speeches which had been delivered one would have supposed that the House was asked to decide whether or not municipalities should own tramways. It that were the issue he would certainly give a vote different from that which he intended to give, because, so far as he was personally concerned, he believed that experience had shown that municipalities could run tramways successfully, and that on the whole they ran them in the interest of the district by which they were elected. But that was not the issue. The importance of the matter had been enormously exaggerated. The question ought to be considered primarily if not entirely, as a matter affecting the locality in which the tramways were running; it was an entire misapprehension to treat it as in any way a question of general principle. That, at any rate, was his opinion. In his official capacity at the Board of Trade it had been his duty to listen to many speeches on the question of tramways in different parts of the country, and the advantages of a through service of trams were continually being pointed out. He ventured to submit that there never was a case in which those advantages were more clearly indicated than in that covered by the Bill. The House would remember a pathetic speech delivered by the hon. Member for Battersea a short time ago in regard to the terrible inconvenience young girls and others were subjected to by having to get out of the trams at Westminster Bridge and find their way by other means, frequently through the pouring rain, to the Embankment. But would not exactly the same inconveniences arise at Newcastle? Were there no young girls at Newcastle? Did it never rain so far north as Newcastle? It was frequently said that the best way of dealing successfully with the housing problems was by a good through system of trams. That argument never applied with more force than to the district concerned in this Bill. The Tyneside Tramways Company's system throughout its course was either bordered by workshops to which men had to go every day, or by land on which buildings for works were being erected and on which still more would be erected if there was a decent through service of trams. But it was really unnecessary to argue the advantages of a through service; everybody would admit them. As to the suggestion that the corporation had put forward an alternative proposal for overcoming the difficulty it should be remembered that they made no alternative proposal of any kind until after a decision had been given against them in another place. Their present proposal had been carefully considered and rejected by the Committee, and he thought the terms of the proposal had only to be stated to convince any impartial man that the Committee could have taken no other course with any show of fair play or justice. The proposal was that the Newcastle Corporation should run their trams over the Tyneside company's system into the heart of Wallsend—that was, through the one populous and paying district, and that the company should have no powers of running cars over the corporation lines.

*SIR JAMES WOODHOUSE pointed out that all the profits were to go to the company.

MR. BONAR LAW said that that was true, but anybody connected with tramways knew that it was not possible to run the remainder of a system at an equally low rate unless they could run cars also on the portion of the system which paid best. But what made the proposal really impossible of acceptance was the fact that the corporation did not propose to run over the whole of the Tyneside Company's system. Had they proposed to do that the decision of the Committee might have been different. The corporation proposed to leave out of account altogether those districts which depended for their profit upon future development. It was urged that those districts were served by the railway, but the only way to compete with the railway was by a through service of trams. The Committee had decided that these facilities were required, and that the method proposed in the Bill was a reasonable way of providing the facilities. The objection of the Newcastle Corporation was that it would seriously interfere with the whole of the tramway system in Newcastle itself. He admitted that the convenience of the greater public had to be considered, and it was considered in this Bill, which simply proposed to do in Newcastle what had been done by agreement in dozens of cases elsewhere. As to the dislocation of the system, surely the difficulties were not greater if it was done by compulsion instead of by voluntary agreement? But the hon. Member himself had stated that if the Bill were recommitted it might be possible to arrange running powers by mutual agreement. Where, then, was the difficulty? If it could be done in the one case, surely it could be done in the other. The Board of Trade, however, was more concerned with the great principle which was said to be involved than with the purely local aspect of the question. He had listened carefully to the speeches with a view to learn what that principle was, and he thought he had found it. He would state it to the House, and if he were wrong he would doubtless be corrected.

MR. BENN: I never made such a statement.

MR. BONAR LAW said the principle was that a private company trading for profit with powers granted by Parliament should not be allowed to have compulsory running powers over lines of tramways when worked by a local authority. He understood that was the principle. [OPPOSITION cries of "Hear, hear!"] Now they had got it. He asked the House was that a principle which any sane man could adopt? Let him point out exactly what it meant. He would assume, for the sake of argument, that the whole fault lay with the corporation and that this difficulty was due to their obstinacy and perhaps to an exaggerated sense of their own importance. The principle he had laid down still held good. According to the contention of hon. Gentlemen opposite, no matter what might be the needs of the district, that district was to have nothing to say in the matter, and the local authority alone must decide and their decision must be final. What was the remedy? The hon. Member suggested an election. Had the hon. Member ever known a district where there was a jealousy existing between a town and a country district? He would state to the House what he thought should be the principle which should guide the House of Commons in this matter. The right to lay down a tramway was granted to a local authority or to a private company, and, the right having been granted, it became a monopoly. As between the two, Parliament gave the preference to the local authority, but once the privilege was given, both parties should be treated exactly in the same way. The question brought for the decision of Parliament was whether through facilities were required, and it was decided that they were, and Parliament in effect said to both parties, "You get your rights from us, and they are given to you not for you to do as you like with them. Through powers are required, and if you do not agree upon terms we will settle the terms for you." That had been done in the present case. The corporation had made an enormous mistake in treating this as a test question, trying to imagine that a new principle was involved. There was no new principle; there were precedents for private companies having running powers over corporation lines. It was argued that there were special circumstances distinguishing these from the present case, but he did not see any difference except in the relative sizes of the districts. In the document sent out by the municipality it was stated that if the principle were affirmed by Parliament a company would only have to construct a short line linking up with a great municipal system, and they would be entitled to running powers over the longer system. Was there a word of truth in that statement? They would have the right to apply for running powers, but they would not obtain such powers unless Parliament were convinced that to grant them would be in the public interest. Would hon. Members say that in the county of Middlesex under no circumstances should a private trading company have running powers over the lines of a local authority, though one authority might have powers over the lines of another local authority? If the House upset the decision of the Committee they would establish the principle that there was to be one scale of justice for private companies and another scale for local bodies. As representing the Board of Trade, he was bound to say that such an action would, in their opinion, be most deplorable. It would be throwing obstacles in the way of private enterprise, and declaring that districts which were served by tramways owned by private companies should be treated in a less fair way than districts served by tramways run by local bodies. He thought this was a case where the decision of the Committee should be upheld.

MR. RUNCIMAN (Dewsbury) said he could not follow the hon. Member's analogy in regard to the principle which guided the Board of Trade in tramway matters. They were not in favour of having these districts isolated, but what they had urged from the first was that, at all events, the corporation should have fair play. The Board of Trade, in holding the balance between municipalities and private companies, ought to have considered the claims of the citizens of Newcastle as well as those who used the Tyneside system. He agreed that running powers were desirable where they were mutually agreed upon, but they should not be forced on one party against their will, either by Parliament or by anyone else. The reason why they regarded this measure as dangerous was that they had in recent years seen an immense growth of municipal enterprise all over the country. Millions of pounds had been spent upon municipal tramways, and if the capital which had been sunk was to be diminished in value in this way by private enterprise stepping in from outside, not only would corporations be deterred from providing municipal tramways, but the property which they now owned would be considerably diminished in value. The hon. Member opposite said that he thought it was unfair that the Newcastle Corporation should invade the Tyneside district and take the cream of the traffic. The case was just the opposite, because the company wished to invade the Newcastle district and take the cream of the traffic on the Newcastle lines owned by the corporation. He did not wish to go into the London analogy, because they could not judge the Newcastle case by anything which took place in London. He wished it to be observed that those who opposed running powers in London had on this occasion entirely changed their attitude, and they were now in favour of compulsory running powers in Tyneside. They were now adopting a new principle which they should apply in their own constituencies. The Newcastle Corporation urged that the district over which the Tyneside company wished to obtain running powers was an immensely crowded district in regard to cars, and he knew no tramway system in the world where a larger number of cars passed per hour than at certain points in this district.

MR. BONAR LAW said there were 6 per cent. more cars in Glasgow.

MR. RUNCIMAN said the Glasgow Corporation viewed the precedent that was being created with the gravest alarm. If even a small matter was imposed upon the Newcastle Corporation, the effect might be to dislocate the most crowded part of their system. That was one of the reasons why they objected to terms being forced upon them which would not suit the system of Newcastle itself, and they urged that Newcastle should receive precedence over the Tyneside Company in the consideration of that House. They had to decide whether it was the Newcastle travelling public or the Tyneside travelling public whose interests ought to be most considered. He thought that Newcastle, with its immense population, should receive precedence over that of the Tyneside population, which was very much smaller, and the Tyneside Company carried a much smaller number of passengers. The view put forward by the supporters of this Bill had not been in the interests of the travelling public, but in the interests of large employers who owned large works in the Tyneside district. He thought they had a right to ask what were the views of the workpeople employed by those manufacturers in the Tyneside district? The workmen who used these cars had expressed the opinion that they did not believe that the Newcastle system should be disturbed simply for the benefit of this tramway company. He thought the views of these workmen ought to have considerable weight with the Members of this House. In this case the Committee had made a serious blunder, because they had allowed these compulsory powers to slip into the Bill without thinking that by so doing they would raise a storm in municipalities all over the country which they never anticipated, and which would certainly have made them think twice before passing such a proposal as this. He hoped the House would avoid this course by deciding to take these two clauses again into their consideration. After what had been said in the House upon this point he hoped hon. Members would of his proposal.

Mr. WILLIAM RUTHERFORD (Liverpool, West Derby) said that speaking with the experience of a former Chairman of the Liverpool Corporation Tramways, there was no difficulty whatever in an outside company obtaining reasonable powers to run through and right into the centre of a corporation system. It was quite obvious that when these monopolies spread their network all over the country sooner or later the different systems must touch one another and come into contact, as they had come into contact in a great many places in the United Kingdom. In other places, however, the parties had generally been men of common sense, and mutual arrangements had been arrived at. The case which they had now got before the House was one where owing to some fault on one side or the other it had proved impossible to come to any reasonable arrangement. In had been said that a small outside company had no right to send its cars right down into the centre of a populous city, because such a thing would cause a great dislocation of the traffic. He thought that with regard to tramways the centre of Liverpool was probably as difficult to deal with as any other part of the kingdom. He was Lord Mayor of that city last year and he knew that arrangements, had been made by the corporation of Liverpool under which cars coming from Bolton and St. Helens passed right into the centre of Liverpool down to the pier head, and they had experienced no difficulty and no dislocation of traffic at all by this arrangement. He had seen the manager's report upon this arrangement, showing the time table, and the scheme was worked in the simplest manner. The method adopted was as follows:—As soon as a tram car belonging to one of the outside companies reached the Liverpool boundary the driver and conductor got off and the driver and conductor belonging to the municipality of Liverpool got on and took the car to the centre of Liverpool and brought it back again. Each side collected their own fares on their own lines upon their own responsibility and supplied their own power, and the corporation paid one penny a mile for the use of the car. Everybody was satisfied with the arrangement and the passengers had not to get down and change cars, and consequently justice was done all round. [An Hon. Member: Were those compulsory powers?] He could not understand why some simple and reasonable arrangement of that kind was not arrived at in this case. After examining the literature on the subject, he had come to the conclusion that the corporation of Newcastle had absolutely refused on any terms to allow a car of the outside company to cross their boundaries. The outside company were thus bound to come to Parliament for compulsory powers, and the granting of them would not do any harm to the corporation of Newcastle, because the terms would be settled by the Board of Trade if the parties were unable to agree. He wished to add one word about the public convenience. When these monopolies were granted by Parliament they were always granted in the interests of the public, and it was the general public who had a right to be considered first. Wherever they had a break in a tramway system it practically meant a double terminus. The financial effect of a double terminus or a single terminus was that for half-a-mile of line up to the terminus that part did not pay, and the consequence was that in the case under consideration they had a mile of line at each of the three places where the routes met which would be useless and less valuable. He thought that this was clearly one of those cases in which the House ought to support the Committee, and although he had done much to help the municipalities to undertake tramways, he still thought it ought to be recognised that municipalities had no rights which private companies did not also possess. He should, on these grounds, support the Committee, and he trusted that in this matter the House would have regard to the interests of the general public and not yield to this Motion. He noticed that the name of Liverpool was down in the list of municipalities supposed to be supporting this Motion, but he did not believe that Liverpool had anything at all to say in support of this Motion.

Mr. HENDERSON (Durham, Barnard Castle) said the hon. Member representing the Tyneside Division had endeavoured to make out that the application made by this company was supported by the workers in the Tyneside district. The various workers' organisations in the Tyneside district had communicated with him and they had specially urged him to do all that lay in his power to induce the Labour Members in the House of Commons to support the attitude which had been taken up by the corporation of Newcastle upon this question. It had been stated that some 27,000 workers had declared themselves through various channels in favour of this company's proposal, but he did not think anything like that number, if appealed to, could be found to support this Bill. The various trade organisations in Newcastle, Tyneside, and Wallsend were against any such powers being granted to this company. The plea of the company was that they wanted to give the workpeople of Tyneside better facilities for travelling between Newcastle and their employment. He knew the district himself very well, for he had worked there, and he could tell the House that there were thousands of workmen, ratepayers in the city of Newcastle, who were unanimously in favour of the position taken up by the Newcastle Corporation, because they recognised that the corporation had taken in hand a vast property. They felt that any further facilities ought to be granted to the corporation and not to a private company which would enter into competition with the corporation in the management of its own trams. He was very much surprised to find that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Board of Trade had spoken with two voices. He began his speech by laying it down that the Government were going to be neutral, but he had not travelled very far when he, in the name of the Board of Trade, a Government Department, laid it down that they were going to support wholesale the proposals of the company. The hon. Gentleman went on to make a comparison between the Newcastle case and the case in which the hon. Member for Battersea took an interest, and which came before the House a few weeks ago. The case with which the hon. Member for Battersea was concerned was entirely different from that which the Secretary to the Board of Trade supported now in name of the Board of Trade. Surely there was a difference between the London County Council desiring to extend its own tramway system and trying to link up two parts of this great city, and the case of a corporation which was resisting a private company from the outside when seeking powers to enter a big city like Newcastle-on-Tyne. The analogy, he held, was a most unfair one. But what struck him most of all when the hon. Gentleman was making that comparison was that the Gentlemen who cheered him on the present occasion were the same Gentlemen who opposed the hon. Gentleman for Battersea in the case which he had in hand on behalf of the ratepayers of London a few weeks ago. There was another point which was surprising to him. If the Secretary to the Board of Trade could come and make this pathetic appeal on behalf of the company's proposals this evening, where was he when his right hon. friend the Member for Battersea was trying to do such a great service for the millions of this great city? They had no pathetic appeal from him then on behalf of the London County Council. It appeared that it was only on behalf of a private company that the Board of Trade went out of its way to appeal to this House to go against the wishes of the people of the district. He hoped the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Huddersfield would receive the approval of the House. At any rate, the Labour Members were determined to support the Corporation in this matter.

SIR ROBERT HERMON-HODGE (Oxfordshire, Henley) said it might be assumed that he had some particular personal knowledge of the matter before the House, because his name appeared on the Whip which had been issued in favour of the corporation of Newcastle-on-Tyne. He desired to say that his name appeared without his authority. He thought that was a very serious matter, which was worth mentioning to the House.

*SIR JAMES WOODHOUSE: I had nothing whatever to do with that Whip, and I did not issue it

*MR. J. A. PEASE (Essex, Saffron Walden) said if he thought the hon. Member for Barnard Castle was correct in his statement that the working classes in Tyneside were opposed to the tramway facilities being granted, which the company asked for under their Bill, he would certainly vote with him, but having represented the Tyneside Division during the last two Parliaments, and having some knowledge of the question, he took entirely a different view. Let the House realise that the riverside population had doubled in the past ten years, and from the point of view of meeting this increase and the prevention of overcrowding it was essential a linked system be formed between Wallsend and Newcastle. He, at any rate, was consistent in supporting a linked system between areas of population both in London and elsewhere, and he did not understand the view taken which would prevent the facilities being given which were locally required. Not only had the voice of the people been heard that day through their elected Parliamentary representative, but every member elected upon the Wallsend Corporation, the urban district council of Willington Quay, and the urban district of Gosforth had petitioned in favour of the Bill—only those Members had abstained who were shareholders in the company promoting the Bill. The House would therefore see that public opinion in Tyneside as represented by the local authorities was unanimously in favour of the company having running powers into Newcastle, and when they found that the corporation was not prepared to act in a reasonable spirit, there was no other course but to support the Bill.

MR. CORRIE GRANT (Warwickshire, Rugby) said they had to deal here with a mixed question. If this were merely a local matter, he should support the action of the Committee. The company convinced the Committee of the House of Lords, and it obtained the unanimous Vote of the Committee of the House of Commons; but they had in this matter a great contest being fought between municipal enterprise on the one hand and private enterprise on the other. [Cries of "No."] Well, he ventured to think so. They had also what always happened in such contests, namely, private enterprise getting the better. The question the House had to decide was whether they were prepared to establish a precedent that compulsory powers were to be given to a private company over a corporation. The Secretary to the Board of Trade got up and defended the application of the company without having taken the trouble to provide himself with information. He did not make that statement without being prepared to support it. He would ask the hon. Member now whether, before he made his speech, he had read the evidence given before the Commons Committee.

MR. BONAR LAW: Every word of it.

MR. CORRIE GRANT said the hon. Gentleman's second point was that as between private enterprise and municipal enterprise, once powers had been granted they ought to be treated equally. He denied that proposition altogether. Private enterprise and municipal enterprise did not stand on the same basis at all. Private companies thought only of the fares that would make the biggest dividends, and they were right in thinking so. Their business was run as a shop. But municipal enterprise took up a different point of view. They ran their enterprise, not for the purpose of earning profit, but for the purpose of serving the community. This was proved by the fact that in connection with many municipal corporations the charges were diminished when they were earning a large profit in order that they might give more facilities to the community they served. On that account private companies and municipal enterprise should be treated differently. The Newcastle Corporation seemed to have acted blindly in this matter. They ought to have said, "We will not have these compulsory powers at all," and they should have fought the proposal of the company on the Second Reading. Was the House now going to inflict on the whole of the municipal corporations of the country a great wrong? He hoped the House would take a broader view than the Committee had taken and would support the Motion of his hon. friend the Member for Huddersfield.

CIVIL SERVICES AND REVENUE DEPARTMENTS ESTIMATES, 1904–5

CLASS I.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £69,100, be granted to His Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1905, for the Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens."

MR. SCOTT-MONTAGU (Hampshire, New Forest) called attention to the regulation under which the motor-car traffic in Hyde Park was restricted to ten miles an hour, and asked the noble Lord the Member for Chorley whether that regulation had been made under the Motor-Car Act, 1903, or under the Parks Regulations Act, 1872. If it had been made under the 1903 Act, then, he contended, the regulation was illegal, inasmuch as the inquiry provided for in that Act had not been held.

MR. WHITLEY (Halifax) said the regulations which had been issued were not grammatical.

MR. DISRAELI (Cheshire, Altrincham) said that in the opinion of a very large number of people motor-cars were entirely out of place in Hyde Park.

NAUTICAL CHARITIES.

LORD MUSKERRY: My Lords, I rise to ask His Majesty's Government whether they would have any objection to furnishing a Return of the various nautical charities existing in the United Kingdom, giving full information as to their administration, the amount of funds at their disposal, how raised and apportioned, the qualifications essential for candidates desirous of obtaining assistance from these charities, and any other information practicable. In putting this Question, I may say that I do so simply because it is believed that certain funds to which our mariners are entitled have fallen into desuetude and are lying idle, when they might be of inestimable benefit to those who follow, or have followed, an arduous and dangerous calling on the high seas, or to those whom they have left behind in poverty or distress, simply because of the hand-to-mouth existence which a sea life means now-a-days. Our nautical charities are so sprinkled and scattered as to render it an almost impossible task for those having no alternative but charity to ascertain where and to whom they may apply. A Return of the kind I suggest would be valuable not only in this, but in bringing before the public many deserving nautical charities which are struggling along and in dire need of that pecuniary assistance which many of our shore-going public might give on knowing the beneficent work they were performing. I have been informed in this House that pensions are granted by the Board of Trade (1) from moneys voted by Parliament to masters who contributed to the Merchant Seamen's Fund previous to August, 1851, and who continued the contribution during the period of their service at sea; (2) from the Greenwich Sixpenny Fund to masters who served at sea for at least five years previous to 1st January, 1835, and who contributed 6d. a month during that period. I fancy that the Board of Trade are not, for instance, overburdened with applications for pensions from masters who have served at sea five years previous to the year 1835, and it is about time that such funds were put to some practical use. A proper Government Return would be of great help in this, and it would be a most useful document for any who are connected with the sea or have a spark of sympathy for the service without which this great Empire could not exist.

LORD WOLVERTON: My Lords, in answer to my noble friend I have to say that the Board of Trade regret that they are not in possession of the information which would enable them to prepare the Return asked for. The Charity Commissioners, with whom the Board of Trade have conferred in the matter, possess information only in regard to the charitable institutions supported by endowments, and these are classified geographically, and not according to the nature of the benefit. It would be possible to prepare a list of the endowed charities in which seamen are entitled to participate, but such a list would be an incomplete one of nautical charities, and the time and labour expended in preparing it would be out of proportion to the result to be obtained.

THE ROYAL DECLARATION AGAINST TRANSUBSTANTIATION.

THE DUKE OF NORFOLK: My Lords, I beg to move the Motion which stands in my name. I do not propose, in doing so, to again go over the reasons which induces me and those who join with me to earnestly appeal to your Lordships' generosity to remove an offensive part from the Royal Declaration. I do not intend to go into all those matters which have stirred our feelings deeply in connection with this subject. They have been sufficiently debated in your Lordships' House already, and I am only too sorry to have to bring the matter up again; but I am afraid it is one of those questions which, until settled, will be always with us, for our religious feelings are wounded in the deepest and most painful way. I fear, however, that I must go a little into the history of the question, because there were certain incidents connected with the treatment of the subject in the session of 1901 and last session which bear upon the general position which it now occupies. Let me at once say that we do appreciate very much indeed the generous feeling we find everywhere that, so far as is possible, this grievance should be set right.

But we are met with a reminder that that generous feeling actually took shape in 1901, that a Committee was then appointed to deal with the problem, that it did deal with it, that it brought forward a modified form of Declaration, one which, in the opinion of those who framed it, ought to have met our demands, and that the attitude we took up on that occasion not only defeated the benevolent intentions of those who were striving to help us, but made it appear hopeless and unnecessary to take any further steps in that direction. It will be remembered that Lord Herries moved for the appointment of a Committee to consider the question; and I wish to quote some words used in the debate, because I think they will tend to remove misapprehension which exists in the minds of some of your Lordships that the Catholic Peers ostentatiously kept away from that Committee. Lord Herries had suggested a doubt whether it was wise that they should be on the Committee, and the late Prime Minister, in moving the appointment of the Committee, said—

"I am rather disposed to agree with the noble Lord (Herries), without being in any way bigoted, that it would be better if the Roman Catholics stood aside from the Committee, and allowed their fellow Peers to judge in this matter, as I think they would be somewhat embarrassed in dealing with it."

What I imagine the noble Marquess had in his mind was that it would be possible for us to accept less if presented by a Committee of which we did not form a part, than we should be justified in accepting if we ourselves were supposed to be the framers of the Motion. That was no doubt what was in the mind of the noble Marquess and it was also what was in our minds, and I think that is an important consideration.

When the statement was made that it might be considered better that noble Lords should be judges of this question without the intervention of Roman Catholic Peers, it never crossed our minds that we were not to be given the opportunity of putting before the judges of this question the reasons why we were anxious that the matter should be dealt with. No effort of any kind, either directly or indirectly, was made to ascertain what the grievances were which the Roman Catholic Peers entertained, and which this Committee was specially appointed to deal with; and, that being the case, I do not think it is very surprising, when we found that the Report of that Committee did not meet the views of those on whose behalf it was appointed, owing to the fact that no attempt to ascertain those views was made, that when it came before your Lordships it was received with very little favour. The most rev. Primate the late Archbishop of Canterbury moved that the Report be referred back to the Committee. Lord Grey spoke strongly on the subject. One or two of his remarks bear out the view I wish to put before your Lordships, and I will read them. Lord Grey, speaking, not of the original Declaration, but of the amended Declaration brought in by the Committee which was intended to solve all our grievances said—

"It offers an unnecessary and gratuitous insult to 12,000,000 of loyal subjects of the King."

A little later the noble Earl said—

"Roman Catholics will realise that the King, in language which can be used by any infidel, is required afresh to repudiate officially and publicly the most sacred doctrine of their religion, and that they are the only sect which are selected for this treatment."

And he went on to say—

"If I were a Roman Catholic, instead of being an ultra-Protestant, as far removed from sympathy with Roman Catholicism as any Member of this House, I think I should prefer to leave the Declaration unamended, and regard it as an archaic and meaningless form, rather than accept this amended Declaration, which will stand forth as the deliberate reaffirmation by Parliament of an anti-Catholic spirit."

I quote that from the speech of Lord Grey, who states that he is as far removed from sympathy with Roman Catholicism as any Member of this House, because, when my noble friend Lord Llandaff made a statement of the same kind, it was seized upon as an argument to show how hopeless it was to meet the views of such retractile people as we were, and that what we wanted was to abolish the Declaration altogether. I quote it to show that it was felt by others as well as by ourselves that this amended Declaration left very much to be desired. It was partly on an argument such as that the Bill was carried through your Lordships' House, but was not sent down to the other House. The Roman Catholic Peers, in difficulty as to how far to support it, felt that it was a well-intentioned effort to meet their wishes, but did not go far enough, and abstained from voting.

The matter rested during the Coronation year, and was brought up again last year, when Lord Grey brought in a Bill for the total abolition of the Declaration. I should like to assure your Lordships that in all we have done as regards moving for an amendment of the Declaration, we have never had it in our minds to get rid of the Declaration altogether, although we have held the belief that it was not necessary, and that the simplest form of dealing with the question would be to abolish it. In the early part of 1901 Lord Grey brought in his Bill, but gave way to Lord Herries, who moved for a Committee. Naturally, when Lord Grey came forward with a Bill to abolish the whole Declaration, we gratefully acknowledged the generous proposal, and gave him all the support we could; but I suggested to him whether it would not be wiser, instead of moving for the abolition of the Declaration, to bring in a Bill to modify it. We have not, as I have said, had it in our mind to abolish the Declaration; we only wish it to be amended.

I now come to the point as to the character of the amendment we desire. What we feel very strongly is that tenets of our faith, so cherished by us and so sacred that it is almost painful that they should be discussed in an Assemblage of this kind at all, should not be required to be publicly repudiated by the Sovereign immediately on his accession to the Throne. At present they are repudiated in a very offensive form. That offensiveness I believe the whole House, with, perhaps, very few exceptions, and I cannot but think the whole country also, is anxious to take away. The object of my Motion is to ask your Lordships to meet us thus far—that while we on our part fully accept the position of the Protestant Succession, while we are fully prepared to stand under the Throne and hear our King assert in as strong language as you wish that he is a Protestant, and, if you like, that he is not a Roman Catholic, we do ask you to stop there and not insist on the King himself having the painful duty of picking out tenets of the faith of the greater part of Christendom throughout the world and publicly repudiating and rejecting them. And we ask this because we do not believe there is any real necessity for it.

The Duke of Norfolk.

We quite feel the justice of what was said by the Archbishop of Canterbury last year that the Coronation Oath did fully safeguard such questions as the maintenance of the reformed religion, but that it was necessary, in addition to that, that the Sovereign should go further and assert that he was himself a Protestant. I am bound to say that as part of the Coronation service is the reception of the Sacrament, I should have thought that assertion was hardly necessary. Still, there is logic in what the most rev. Primate said, that the Sovereign should make it clear and manifest that he is a bona fide Protestant and not a Roman Catholic in disguise. To that we quite agree; but we do dissent from the view that it is necessary to repudiate our doctrines in the way in which they are repudiated.

Again I must trouble your Lordships with one or two extracts from the speeches which were made on this subject. Lord Spencer, who was a member of the Committee, speaking in the debate on 8th June, 1901, said that in some ways he differed from the majority of the Committee, but not sufficiently to justify signing a Minority Report. He therefore assented to the general propositions of the Committee; but he used these words—

> "I should have desired that the actual mention of doctrines should have been omitted from this Declaration."

I have alluded to the speech of the most rev. Primate. He stated, as I have just reminded your Lordships, that he did think some assurance was necessary as to the private belief of the King; that is to say, that the King was not merely a man who was minded to keep up the Protestant religion, but was himself a Protestant. But the most rev. Primate expressed the opinion that the matter should be dealt with. He used these words—

> "There is a widespread feeling, not only in this House and in the country, but in the Colonies, that this matter can hardly be allowed to stand indefinitely exactly as it does now."

And a little later on he said—

> "But if it is true, as I think it is true, that some such Declaration is necessary, it surely does not follow that it need be couched in insulting words, and I do not think it need, strictly speaking, denounce anything at all. It seems to me perfectly possible, at least it is not beyond the wit of man, to devise a Declaration which should be mainly positive rather than negative in character and form. I do not believe it is impossible to draw up a Declaration which should avoid not only anything offensive, but anything denunciatory. I trust the matter will not be allowed to rest."

Therefore, I venture to say that there is a widespread feeling everywhere that the matter ought not to be allowed to rest. It appears to me, whether your Lordships accept the Motion which I now move, or whether you accept the Amendment which I see has been placed on the Paper by the noble Earl beside me, Lord Jersey, that it will be necessary that some Committee should be appointed to deal with the matter and to see whether the problem cannot be solved. There are some, I think, including the noble Earl on the Woolsack, and, I think, Lord Rosebery, who have stated that in their opinion it would not be possible to draw up any form of Declaration which did not in some form or other denounce or repudiate certain tenets of our faith. The most rev. Primate the Archbishop of Canterbury has stated that in his opinion it ought not to pass the wit of man to be able to devise some Declaration of the kind. I venture to think, that being the state of the case, that I am justified in calling upon your Lordships to take action of some kind.

I trust the House will see its way to accept the Motion which I have put down, but, at all events, I do hope the issue of this debate will be that some Committee will be appointed to consider the problem; and I do ask, whether Roman Catholics be placed on that Committee or not, that at all events the Committee will not report on our grievances without at least having given us the opportunity of stating fully what our grievances are. They are grievances which, when stated, it may be found impossible to meet; but, at all events, let us bring them before the Committee; let them be fully considered, and let us see whether it is not possible to devise some form of words which shall declare the Protestantism of the King without insulting the faith of so many of his subjects. I really cannot understand why it is that so many people are determined that this latter course must be resorted to. It has been stated that Protestantism is a very negative thing; that you cannot define it. It is almost suggested that the only form of profession of Protestant faith is to denounce and attack the faith held by other people. I can hardly suppose that that is a view which can be supported, and I would quote the opinion of the noble and learned Earl on the Woolsack, who is distinctly of another opinion. The noble and learned Earl said on 8th June, 1901—

> "But can anybody suppose that there is the least doubt as to what the Protestant faith is? I do not mean to say that there are not differences and divergencies in the forms of Protestant profession; but everybody does know, as a matter of fact, the meaning of the Protestant religion, certainly as contrasted with the Roman Catholic faith."

If that is so clear and manifest, is it impossible to devise some form of words which the Monarch can use without specially picking out our doctrine for condemnation? I cannot but think, with the most rev. Primate, that the problem is not beyond the wit of man to solve. If that be so, I would earnestly beg your Lordships to pass this Resolution as an expression of your opinion that, if possible, it ought to be solved. Of course, a Resolution of this House is not an Act of Parliament. It may be that even if your Lordships express that opinion it will be found beyond the wit of man to devise such a form of words. I cannot myself believe that it would be, and I trust that the generous expression of regret at this insult offered to our faith, which we feel, believe me, more deeply than even insulting words to ourselves, will lead to the grievance being taken in hand and dealt with.

I have read the Amendment to be moved by the noble Earl. If he could see his way to move it as a rider to my Resolution I would gladly accept it, for that would bring in what I think many of your Lordships are slow in accepting as our statement that we are perfectly prepared to do nothing which would endanger the Protestant Succession. If the noble Earl will allow that to follow as a rider, and if it is thought that that would make my Resolution more palatable, and that less danger would lurk in it in consequence, I would gladly accept it. The Amendment standing in the name of Lord Stanmore does not carry us any further. I content myself for the present with moving my Resolution, and I trust your Lordships will feel that it is not too much to ask that Parliament should not only relieve us of this sore trial, but also the future Sovereigns of England of what must be to them a most painful, and, as we maintain, a most needless ordeal.

Moved to resolve, "That whereas, under the Bill of Rights and the Act of Settlement, the Sovereign is required to join in Communion with the Church of England as by law established, and ample securities are provided to ensure the Protestant Succession to the Crown; and whereas in addition to these securities, the Sovereign is required, immediately after his Accession, to make a Declaration, commonly called the Declaration against Transubstantiation, which is deeply and needlessly offensive to many millions of loyal subjects of His Majesty, this House is of opinion that the Declaration aforesaid ought to be amended so as not to include the condemnation or repudiation of specific doctrines which form part of the conscientious beliefs of any of His Majesty's subjects."—(The Duke of Norfolk.)

*THE EARL OF JERSEY: My Lords, every Member of this House respects the feelings which have caused the noble Duke to bring forward this Resolution. He has addressed us with an earnestness of feeling, and yet at the same time with a moderation of language which will add greatly to the high esteem in which he is already held in this House and in the country. Happily, we live in days when we trust our fellow-subjects, quite irrespective of what their religious beliefs may be. We do not think it necessary to prove our own orthodoxy by insults to those who hold different religious views, and I can assure the noble Duke and those who belong to his Church that I have not put down this Amendment out of hostility or indifference to the feelings of those who are wounded by the words in the Declaration. It would be most repugnant to my own feelings to support words which criticised or cast a stigma upon tenets which are dear to his great Church, and which are held by millions of our fellow-subjects. At the same time I am afraid I must persevere with my Amendment as an Amendment independent of his Resolution.

The noble Duke has alluded to what has taken place in this House during the last three or four years upon this subject. It has been widely debated, as a matter of this importance ought to be, and I think that two points come out clearly—the first, the one to which he has alluded, namely, that there is a desire, a very general, if not a universal desire, on the part of the Members of this House to make alterations in the Declaration which would remove all language which is offensive to Roman Catholics; and the other is that this House has unmistakably shown its intention to maintain a Declaration by the Sovereign when, under the Act of Settlement, he succeeds to the Throne, and one which will be a proof to his subjects that he belongs to the Protestant Faith and to no other. An oath, it is true, may not be an absolute security, but it is a security the importance of which is understood by the person who takes it, and by those before whom it is taken—in this case the nation at large

I respect, and I quite understand, the views of those who, like the noble Duke, object strongly that the dogmas of one religion should be picked out for special repudiation in a Declaration; but I think, my Lords, we cannot approach this subject entirely free from past considerations. The memory of a people is tenacious; causes and events of past times leave their impressions upon succeeding generations long after they have lost their vividness. So it is in the case of this Declaration. Our forefathers struggled with determination to take every human step possible that the successions to the Throne should be Protestant, and to prevent the accession of a Roman Catholic King. They carried out their policy with hardship and with insults, I admit, and I regret it. Those hardships have slowly, perhaps too slowly, been removed, and the insults, I believe, everyone in this House would be only too glad to obliterate; but is it within the range of practical politics to eliminate the language of the Declaration which tries to make it clear that no ruler of this realm shall owe obedience, spiritual or otherwise, to any foreign authority, however venerable, however deservedly respected?

The original framers of this Declaration selected as a test tenets which they apprehended must be held by any Roman Catholic, assuming that if the Sovereign repudiated those tenets he would be repudiating the faith which they dreaded. I have already said they put it into language which we most of us regret, and I have no hesitation also in saying that I trust the opportunity will be taken to remove the most offensive words from the Declaration before circumstances demand them to come into use again. We must recollect also that there are many in this country who have a conscientious objection to waiving in the Declaration taken by the Sovereign the repudiation of the Roman Catholic religion. We, perhaps, in this House can take a wider, a juster, and a more generous view. We can believe, and we do believe, as the noble Duke has said, that the members of his Church have no wish whatever to interfere with the Protestant Succession, but this House does not contain all the intelligence or all the feeling in the country; and I would ask, even if this House decided to make the alteration and to eliminate the words to which objection is taken, does this House think that it will represent the views of the country? I doubt it. But at the same time, I believe it is necessary that a Committee should be appointed to consider this subject, but whether at the present moment it is not, of course, for me to say.

The noble Duke suggests that there should be no condemnation or repudiation of specific doctrines which form part of the conscientious beliefs of any of His Majesty's subjects. Well, if you could strike upon a form of words which would not attack the conscientious opinions of anyone, and whilst exercising this reticence would also safeguard that upon which the nation has hitherto set its mind, it would be a good thing; but I think it would be perhaps unwise for us to say beforehand that we would have no repudiation of any doctrines in the Declaration. But, of course, if a repudiation should be found eventually to be necessary, that could be expressed in terms courteous and respectful to all. I think, though the noble Duke does not quite agree with me, that there lies in the Amendment which I have put down the germs of a decision which will eventually cause, if not full, perhaps some satisfaction, some just satisfaction, to him and his co-religionists. Ask this House to remove any words which will give offence and the response will be favourable, but do not ask this House to go so far as to break entirely with the past. Do not ask it to take a step which might, and which undoubtedly would, be misconstrued in the country. We want to maintain, and we must maintain, every possible guarantee that the Sovereign of this country should belong to the Protestant faith. I think we can do so without casting any reflection or any insults upon those who differ in religion. The Sovereign of this country, it must be remembered, is placed in a political position, and it has been political reasons which have hitherto governed this country in this matter.

I certainly trust, after the debate in your Lordships' House, that there will be a still more generous disposition to come together and try to do everything in our power to relieve those who have hitherto, I quite admit, been allowed to suffer under a grievous wrong and a grievous insult. There is no question of the Church of England. That is protected under the Oath taken at the Coronation. But we have asked, the nation has asked, that their King shall make a clear Declaration, and I, for one, must say that I think we ought to adhere to this demand. The principle running through that Declaration has been asked for by succeeding Parliaments, who have been the representatives of the will of the nation. It has been assented to by a long line of illustrious Sovereigns. Let us try so to word the Declaration that, whilst it will give full confidence to the nation, it will in no wise contain a single expression which could justly offend the feelings of any of the loyal subjects of the Crown in any part of the Empire.

Amendment moved—

"To leave out the words after the word 'That' and to insert the words 'this House, while desirous that no expression unnecessarily offensive to any of his subjects should be required of the Sovereign on His Accession to the Throne, is of opinion that nothing should be done to weaken the security of the Protestant Succession.'"—(The Earl of Jersey.)

*THE LORD ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY: My Lords, I do not propose to trespass very long on your Lordships to-night, partly because, mainly because, this time last year when this matter was debated I ventured to state my views on the subject very fully. The noble Duke, in speech the high merit of which has been so well described by the noble Earl who has just sat down, referred to what I said last year, but I am not quite sure that I can accept the quotations by themselves and apart from their context as accurately conveying the opinion I then gave expression to, and to which to-night I desire to adhere. I yield to none in my dislike to any tests that are unnecessary, above all to unnecessary tests of a religious kind which are a bar in any way to civil employment. But there must be, and there are, exceptions to that rule. Take an example from a much lower grade in national responsibility. We have again and again reiterated in this House our view that there is nothing inappropriate in a religious test being applied to a man who has to teach a particular faith so as to show that he holds the faith which he has to inculcate in others.

I think that in the judgment of the whole House it is absolutely necessary that there should be some security given to the nation as a whole as to the attitude which the august personage who occupies the Throne holds towards the faith which is professed by a vast majority of the subjects over whom in the home regions of the Empire he rules. The Declaration which has been commented upon to-night and on previous occasions was, of course, originally imposed for the purpose of securing, in the first instance, that the Sovereign should not be in any way hampered in the discharge of his great duties by allegiance of any kind to an external Power, and further, that he should not be able to throw the weight of his incomparable authority in favour of any change in the national faith. We all agree that those principles have to be secured, and no one has expressed himself more clearly to that effect than the noble Duke himself. There is, therefore, need of a Declaration of some sort; and further, everyone in this House is agreed that such Declaration when made should be drawn so as to give a minimum of pain or disquietude to any citizen or group of citizens in this country, which counts among the proudest of all its boasts the boast of maintaining absolute religious liberty.

Reference has been made to the security given by the Coronation Oath. But note, my Lords, that it is what it professes to be a Coronation Oath. Some little time, however, must always elapse between the date of the Accession and the date of the Coronation, nor do I know that there is any constitutional or legal compulsion on the Sovereign to have a Coronation ceremony at all. If that be so, we must beware lest we regard what takes place in that service as in itself adequate for meeting the need which in the opinion of the overwhelming majority of the people of England exists for some security of this kind. Then it was said by the noble Duke that the Declaration might be so altered as to do all it aimed at while avoiding any specific reference to a faith which has to be repudiated.

THE DUKE OF NORFOLK: Specific doctrines.

*THE LORD ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY: While avoiding any reference to specific doctrines which have to be repudiated. Well, my Lords, I should like to see in black and white the Declaration which does that, and which yet meets the difficulties which we are face to face with. Obviously no one now-a-days would choose the epithets to which exception is, I think, most legitimately taken in the Declaration as it now stands. Those epithets belong to a period two centuries ago, when on both sides controversialists were accustomed to be far less sensitive than they are to day to the feelings of those who differed from them. Those epithets belong to a period entirely different from our own, and they are, in the fullest sense of the word, an anachronism to-day. On the other hand, as we have been reminded by the noble Earl who spoke last, we cannot in this matter act as though the history of England 200 years ago had been different from what it was. When King James II. ascended the Throne he took the Coronation Oath in a form not very different from that in which it is taken to-day, and, apart from that, there was the voluntary Declaration on the part of the Sovereign, publicly made to the Privy Council, that—

> "I shall make it my endeavour to preserve this Government both in Church and State as it is now by law established."

It is impossible to forget that those things were said, those sacred promises solemnly made, and that the events of the next few years followed. Without the slightest desire to suggest that history is likely to repeat itself in any such way, we are bound to take care lest we loosen obligations which 200 years ago were found necessary, because the simpler sort of promises had proved incapable of resisting the strain put upon them.

It is our duty to take heed how we weaken a Declaration which, however painful and offensive in its outward form, is yet in its practical bearing universally admitted to be incapable to-day of giving way after the fashion in which the simpler promises yielded to strain 200 years ago. We have to beware lest in the desire to be kindly and conciliatory in language we do anything to weaken the effectiveness of the Declaration. I stated in the former debate, and the noble Duke has quoted what I said, that possibly words of a merely positive sort, with a complete absence of denunciation, or even of repudiation, might be devised. I am bound to admit that subsequent communications I have had upon this matter make me feel less sanguine than I was as to the practicability of devising such words so as to meet the demands of all those concerned. It does not seem to me that repudiation need necessarily contain anything whatever of insult or anything which could legitimately cause offence, but repudiation of some kind I have come to think is absolutely necessary if the Declaration made is to hold the character we all desire that it should hold of an effective and really binding sort so as to be acceptable to Englishmen generally.

But, my Lords, I feel that in this matter we are absolutely bound to throw the responsibility on the Government of the day and to leave the responsibility there. It is for that reason that I feel more than a difficulty as to the words of the noble Duke's own proposal. He desires that something shall be done to bring about an amelioration of the existing tension, for it is nothing less, on this subject, but in stating how it is to be done the noble Duke seems to me to go somewhat further than it is necessary to go when he lays down specifically the character of the Declaration which should be devised. The noble Duke says that it is to be done by a Declaration which must have a definite and specific character which he describes. It does not seem to me that we need go into such detail as that when we are expressing our desire that some modification of that Declaration may now or hereafter be made which shall meet the difficulties while retaining its effectiveness and its power. If the noble Duke will show us—and if His Majesty's Government will take in hand the task of giving effect to what he has shown — how a new Declaration can be framed in the way he desires, I for one shall welcome it, and feel that we have done the right thing, supposing always we retain the effectiveness while altering the form. But at present I fail to understand how this can be done, if repudiation of doctrine forms no part of the document. I, therefore, feel that our business is to leave upon the Executive Government of the day the responsibility of dealing with what I admit to be a grave difficulty. It is for them to say in what way, and by what means, the modification can be brought about which we all wish to see effected in the Declaration taken by the Sovereign at an hour when we desire, above all other times, that we shall as far as possible be of one heart and one mind in giving a welcome to him who is to rule over the country.

*EARL COWPER: My Lords, I wish to say a few words on this question. It seems to me that the objection to the Motion of the noble Duke is that we do not wish to pledge ourselves not to insist upon distinct repudiation of certain doctrines which are held by the Church of Rome. There is no doubt we have been told by those who represent the Roman Catholics in this House that they do object to this distinct repudiation of their doctrines, that it wounds their feelings, and that they consider it most objectionable, and will not be satisfied with anything except doing away with it. It seems to me that our discussion is merely between this and a simple affirmation that the Sovereign is in favour of the Protestant religion. If this is really true, I do not deny that I myself would recommend that we should be content with this simple affirmation. It will satisfy the people of England that the King intends to be a Protestant, and that is all we can hope for as to any security this Declaration may give us against having a Catholic Sovereign. What now, for instance, is our danger, if there is any? If the heir to the Throne happened to be brought up as a Catholic, known to be one, and the whole country felt that as soon as he ascended the Throne he would throw his whole weight in that direction, there would be such a rising among the people, such a strong feeling, such a violent Protestant outbreak, that there would be no chance whatever of such a man succeeding to the Throne. The laws would be put in force, and if there was any danger of the laws not being sufficiently strong, new ones would be enacted. This is not the danger we have to fear; I do not deny that there is some slight danger, but not in that direction. There is no doubt that during our life-time there has been a pretty strong current in favour of conversion to the Church of Rome. It is, I am happy to say, less strong now than it was some years ago, but it is not yet spent. These conversions, as you know, have chiefly taken place in the upper classes, among families where you would least expect it. You have no guarantee that what has operated on so many others may not operate on the Royal family. We have no certainty that even the occupant of the Throne may not become converted to that Church.

There is, I am happy to say, no tendency whatever, so far as I can see, of any present member of the Royal family taking that line, but we do not know what may happen in another generation. These conversions just as often as not take place in middle and later life, and many of these men, long after they had reached years of discretion, would have been most happy to have taken this Declaration against transubstantiation and everything else. We have no security whatever against the danger which I have mentioned, which is the only one I can see any possibility of. If, therefore, this Declaration is not by any means a certain and sure guarantee that we shall have a Protestant Sovereign, then I maintain we have no right to hurt people's feelings unnecessarily in order to cause it to be made. Therefore, I cannot help feeling that it would be quite sufficient to calm the feelings of the people of this country and satisfy sensitive consciences, if the Sovereign in some form or other declared that he is in favour of the maintenance of the Protestant religion.

I think we all feel that the English Catholics are not people who ought to be unnecessarily wounded and offended. They are among the most loyal of British subjects. They have shown themselves in time of danger and difficulty as ready as any of our fellow-Protestants to come forward to give their money and risk their lives for their country. We many of us most fully incline not only to take away those most offensive words which are used now, and which everybody is in favour of removing, but even to take away, if necessary, this formal repudiation of doctrines which they hold so dear. I have not before spoken on this matter, and I beg to say that I shall have the greatest pleasure in voting for the Motion submitted by the noble Duke.

*THE MARQUESS OF RIPON: My Lords, I gave way to my noble relative and I am very glad I did so, because we have had from Earl Cowper an important declaration in favour of the Motion moved by the noble Duke. The Roman Catholic Members of this House are in regard to this question in a special position, and, as one of them, I rise for the purpose of expressing freely my own opinions. Those opinions may not be shared by others who do not belong to the Roman Catholic Church, but I am speaking for myself alone, and I wish to exercise, therefore, complete freedom in what I desire to submit to your Lordships. In one respect, at all events, I agree with what fell from the most rev. Primate. This question, of course, involving considerations of a constitutional character and great fundamental constitutional statutes, can only be really and effectively dealt with by the Government. All that can be done until they deal with the question is that Parliament should, as far as it can, express its own views in regard to the matter.

Now, my Lords, as far as my own individual opinion is concerned, I place no faith whatever in Declarations of this kind. I believe that bad men will take as many of them as you like to put before them, and that good men will be controlled, and much better controlled, by the most simple expressions that can be found. But, my Lords, that is not the position which I desire to take up as a Roman Catholic Member of this House. I do not ask your Lordships to have no Declaration at all. I believe that there is truth in what has been said by others already in this discussion, that a great amount of importance is attached, I think erroneously, to some Declaration of this kind; and, therefore, in full accordance with the Motion made by my noble friend opposite, I think it would be wise, in the interests of the Roman Catholic body, that a Declaration of a fitting sort should be retained. There is nothing, I think, of greater interest to the Roman Catholic people of this country than that there should be no suspicion that we have the slightest desire to interfere with the Protestant Succession. That Succession has, as the most rev. Primate has reminded us, been in existence for more than two centuries, and nothing could be more unwise than that a limited body like the Catholics should set themselves against what I believe to be the deliberate opinion of the people of this country.

The people of this country are in the majority Protestants, and if they think it important to their interests, their religious or their secular interests, that their Sovereign should be of the same creed, I am not here for a moment to gainsay their right to require that that should be the case. That opinion is not a new one in history. It was the opinion which animated the League in France in the 16th century when they refused to acknowledge Henri IV. until he had been reconciled to the Catholic Church. That being the view of the majority of the people of this country, I think it is right and proper that their wishes in regard to the matter should prevail, and certainly the worst thing that could happen in the interests of the Roman Catholic portion of the population would be that any change should be attempted to be made in the substantial provision for the Protestant Succession. But I ventre to submit that the Declaration in its present form gives no more real additional security than would be given by a moderate Declaration such as nobody in this House or out of it doubts would be drawn up at the present time if the question were now to be raised in the first instance. It seems to me, from what has already been said in this discussion, that there is a general feeling—I had almost said a universal feeling—in this House that the language in this Declaration which is offensive to Roman Catholics should be got rid of, but we seem to be impotent with regard to the matter. If you wish to get rid of those words, surely it is not beyond the wit of man to devise some Declaration which, while it would give such security as a Declaration of that sort is supposed to be able to give, would at least not inflict upon the King's Roman Catholic subjects the pain of hearing from the Throne a Declaration having words in it which are insulting to the Roman Catholic faith.

I hope, my Lords, that we shall hear something of a more definite and distinct kind in regard to the views of His Majesty's Government on this matter. I have little quarrel with the Amendment of my noble friend opposite. He supported it in a speech marked by the ability and moderation which always distinguish him, but I confess I am unable to see what advantage will be gained in regard to this matter by passing my noble friend's Amendment. My noble friend makes two statements. He states his desire to get rid of the words in the Declaration which are offensive to Roman Catholics, and he expresses his desire to do nothing which would weaken the security of the Protestant Succession. I agree with him. But he makes those two statements by way of preface, and then he stops short. He draws no conclusion. How is my noble friend going to get rid of the offensive words of this Declaration unless by having the Declaration altered; and does my noble friend mean to say there is no possible means by which this Declaration could be altered, so as to remove from it its offensive character as regards Roman Catholics, and at the same time to retain every security for the Protestant Succession? I cannot think that is impossible. I, therefore, feel the greatest hope that we shall have some sort of assurance such, for instance, as will be conveyed by the adoption of the Amendment of Lord Stanmore, that this question will be fully and deliberately considered.

When this Declaration was first introduced to be taken by the Sovereign, it was already taken by a great many persons in the country, by a previous Act of Charles II., but it was applied to the person of the Sovereign in days immediately succeeding to the Declaration—that untruthful Declaration—which was made by James II., and to which the most rev. Primate has alluded. It is, therefore, not very surprising that, if our ancestors at that time thought that by heaping up words they would give greater security to themselves in regard to this matter, they should have taken that course. But, my Lords, I venture to say that it is perfectly futile. As I said just now, a bad man—Charles II., for instance—would have taken twenty such Declarations, and, if I may use the expression, would have made no bones about it; but a good man would only be troubled in his conscience by this heaping up of words, and you have in reality no necessity for them. If you want a Declaration, have a Declaration; but you have no necessity whatever for making it of a character which is insulting towards a large portion of His Majesty's subjects.

This Declaration I venture to say must be amended. I am not now speaking of it as it affects the Roman Catholic body; but there is language in it which the Sovereign is obliged to declare, and which I heard our present Gracious Sovereign declare from the Throne, which, in my judgment, and I think it must be so in the judgment of every one of your Lordships, is a gross insult upon the King. After the experience of James II. and of others of the House of Stuart, for they were not a truthful family, it was perhaps not unnatural that Parliament should have tried to tie them up in this manner; but, my Lords, we all feel very differently towards the Royal family under whom we now have the happiness to live. We all know that there is no shadow of dishonesty, no chance of untruthfulness, with regard to them; and surely, that being the case, it is highly improper that we should force the Sovereign when he opens his first Parliament, at one of the most interesting and important periods of his reign, to use these words. I am almost ashamed, my Lords, to read them, but for the purpose of this argument it is necessary—

> "And I doe solemnely in the presence of God professe, testifie, and declare that I doe make this declaration and every part thereof in the plaine and ordinary sence of the words read unto me as they are commonly understood by English Protestants without any evasion, equivocation, or mentall reservation whatsoever, and without any dispensation already granted me for this purpose by the Pope or any other authority or person whatsoever, or without any hope of such dispensation from any person or authority whatsoever, or without thinking that I am or can be acquitted before God or man, or absolved of this declaration or any part thereof, although the Pope or any other person or persons or power whatsoever should dispense with or annull the same, or declare that it was null and void from the beginning."

My Lords, those are the words of men who distrust their Sovereign. We do not distrust our Sovereign. We are animated towards him by the warmest feelings of loyalty, and I do say that it is most unbecoming that a new Sovereign should be required to use words of such a description, implying such distrust, on the first occasion that he meets his Parliament. Unfortunately, this is a matter in which it is dangerous to wait. We all hope that the life of King Edward VII. may be greatly prolonged. Already during his short reign he has given us many occasions and many reasons for gratitude. We are bound to him by every tie of attachment and respect. But, my Lords, all human life is uncertain. If a demise of the Crown takes place there is no help; the Declaration must be taken, because you cannot at that time alter the law. Therefore, my Lords, I do submit that in whatever form it be, by whatever means it is brought about, you must in that respect at least alter this Declaration before the Crown becomes vacant; and if you are going to touch it at all, I am confident there is no Peer among your Lordships who would consent to leave those words, which are insulting to Roman Catholics, in an altered Declaration.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of LANSDOWNE): My Lords, I think it may be convenient to your Lordships that before the debate proceeds further something should be said from this Bench as to the manner in which His Majesty's Government regard the Motions which are before your Lordships' House; and I am the more impelled to make such a statement because both the most rev. Primate and the noble Marquess opposite made in the course of their speeches a direct appeal to His Majesty's Government for information as to the manner in which they propose to deal with this most important question. I take it that I shall not be contradicted if I say that in all parts of the House there is a widespread and earnest desire that this question should be settled in a reasonable and temperate manner. Indeed, we can scarcely do otherwise than look back with mortification at what the noble Marquess, I think, called our impotence to deal with this problem. We feel that it is deplorable that this grievance should remain rankling in the minds of the Roman Catholic subjects of the King, and it is particularly deplorable that at the time of the accession of the Sovereign, when men's thoughts are full of loyalty, and hope, and patriotism, their feelings should be distracted and tortured by the kind of doubts to which this question has given rise.

The noble Marquess has stated that His Majesty's Government should deal with the matter themselves. I am almost tempted to reply that the noble Marquess somewhat over-rates the power of the Government of the day to dispose of a question so much controverted as this. The Government of the day is not in the position of a superior authority imposing terms upon two reluctant disputants. There are limitations upon our powers of even suggesting terms to them. Those limitations, to my mind, are in in two directions. In the first place, it is impossible for us to put forward any settlement which is disapproved of by the great body of our Protestant fellow-subjects. I assure the noble Marquess that we deeply appreciate the feelings which he has expressed on behalf of his co-religionists, but the feelings of he Protestant community are not less deep-seated; and no Government, however strong, could trifle with those feelings or force upon the Protestant people of this country a settlement of which in their hearts they disapproved. That is one limitation upon our power to solve the problem; but, my Lords, there is another. I do not believe any Government will find it possible to effect a settlement of this question unless the leaders of public opinion on both sides are able to show us that they have arrived, of their own accord, at the basis of a settlement. It does not seem to me that it is for the Government to discover, still less to dictate, the terms of a compromise; but I do think it is for those who, either on behalf of the Protestant or of the Roman Catholic community, come forward as the leaders of public opinion, to show that they are at any rate within a measurable distance of an agreement on this question.

I ask your Lordships whether, up to the present time, evidence has been forthcoming to show that we are near enough to such an agreement to admit of a hope that it may be brought about? The history of these discussions is recent in your Lordships' minds. We have not forgotten the abortive attempts at legislation that took place in the year 1901; they were to many of us grievously disappointing. In the earlier stages of this discussion it certainly seemed that we were not very far apart. The Protestant community readily admitted that the Declaration was offensive and needed amendment. Roman Catholics, on their side, freely admitted their readiness to maintain the Protestant Succession. Well, your Lordships recollect what happened. We introduced a Bill containing an amended Declaration. The noble Marquess who spoke last read to your Lordships those parts of the Declaration which seemed most offensive to him and his co-religionists.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON: I beg my noble friend's pardon. I read the parts which related to the King. I did not read a word of the part which relates to Roman Catholics.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: The noble Marquess read with great emphasis a long passage comprising fully one-half of the Declaration.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON: But not the part relating to Roman Catholics.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: What I wish to impress upon the House is, that in our Bill of 1901 the passages which the noble Marquess read were expunged from the Declaration which we proposed to your Lordships. Your Lordships recollect the course of the debate that then took place. It became apparent that our proposal, which was criticised by our Protestant friends, was not acceptable to the Roman Catholic Peers, nor indeed to many other Peers. It is quite true, as the noble Duke reminded the House, that Lord Grey, as well as Lord Llandaff, took exception to the terms of the amended Declaration; but there was this that was remarkable in their criticism of it, that they gave us distinctly to understand that they infinitely preferred to keep the old unamended offensive Declaration rather than to substitute for it what I think the noble Lord called a "milk and water" Declaration fortified by the sanction of recent legislation. Well, my Lords, we made our attempt, and in the face of criticism of that kind we had no choice but to abandon it. We naturally ask ourselves whether this evening's discussion has brought us any nearer to an agreement. I listened attentively to the speech of the noble mover, and I ask permission to associate myself with those who have commended the noble Duke for the tone and temper by which his remarks were characterised.

The noble Duke made, I thought, some very important admissions. He told your Lordships that in his view it was reasonable to retain a Declaration, that it must be one which would be effectual for the maintenance of the Protestant Succession, and I think I understood him to add that it must be drawn in terms which would make it perfectly clear that the Sovereign not only was to be a Protestant, but that he was not to be a Roman Catholic. Well, my Lords, I welcome the feelings which led the noble Duke to make that overture to us; but I am obliged to look at the terms of the Resolution he has placed on the Paper, and I observe it is for him a sine qua non that the amended Declaration shall not include the repudiation of any specific doctrine which forms part of the conscientious belief of any of His Majesty's subjects. Now, my Lords, we have to consider what kind of a Declaration that would be in which no repudiation found any place at all. I am one of those who believe—I regret to have to say it—that if we are to have a Declaration, and it is to be an effectual Declaration, it is impossible to avoid in some shape or form a repudiation of certain doctrines. Without such repudiation it seems to me the Declaration would be little more than a feeble echo of the Coronation Oath. In these circumstances is the offer which the noble Duke makes to us—that is, of a Declaration without the language which, in the view of many of us, must contribute to make it effectual—is that an offer which we are able to accept? I fear that I must answer that question in the negative, and that I must say that those who sit near me prefer to vote for the Amendment of the noble Earl. The noble Earl's Amendment came in for criticism on the part of the noble Marquess. He suggested to your Lordships, in effect, that it was little more than a platitude, and that it required some operative words at the end to give it any importance. I do not agree with that. It seems to me that the Amendment of the noble Earl emphasises what we have already affirmed by our attempt at legislation in 1901, our desire to expunge from the Declaration any words which give needless offence to our Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen. That was our feeling in 1901, and it is our feeling now.

But the real question is whether we can go a little further, and whether the time has come for re-opening the investigation of this question, and accepting the suggestion which will be made later in the evening to your Lordships by the noble Lord on the Cross Benches of the appointment of a Committee. I am aware that the Committee of 1901 appeared to many of your Lordships an unsatisfactory and inconclusive inquiry. My impression is that the Committee was given a mandate by this House, and that it carried out its mandate faithfully and conscientiously; but when I say that, I do not suggest that I cannot conceive of an inquiry which might be fuller and more convincing in its results, and which might during its course elicit, to an extent to which the Committee of 1901 did not elicit, the opinion of Roman Catholic Peers. But again I ask the House whether we shall be well advised to embark upon such an inquiry, unless we could arrive more near an understanding than I am afraid has yet been the case. What I am afraid of is this, that what might be called a fishing inquiry would not only not lead to any result, but might have the effect of further accentuating the differences to which we all desire to give as little prominence as possible. But, my Lords, while we do not see our way this evening to vote for the appointment of a Committee, I am certainly inclined to say that if, as the result of those less formal communications which are so easily made between parties who do not agree in opinion, it should prove to be the case that there really is a common ground upon which such an inquiry can proceed, then we should certainly be glad to see such an inquiry instituted; and all I can say is that if that happy condition of things should arise, no Members of your Lordships' House would be better pleased than His Majesty's Government to see a satisfactory and friendly termination of a difference which we all sincerely regret, and which we all sincerely desire to see removed.

*THE EARL OF CREWE: My Lords, I also desire, on behalf of my noble friends who sit on this Bench, to associate myself with what has been said with regard to the speech of the noble Duke who introduced this Motion. We all of us, I think, sympathise with the motives which induced him to re-open this question, and our sympathy was increased by the form and manner of his speech. The noble Duke did not show the slightest trace of bitterness, when some little bitterness would have been, in the opinion of many of us, quite excusable. The noble Duke and the noble Marquess who has just sat down both alluded to the abortive Committee and the abortive attempt at legislation of 1901. The failure of that Committee to reach a conclusion satisfactory to your Lordships was, as a matter of fact, due to a misunderstanding, possibly on the part of the Committee, but also on the part of some Members of your Lordships' House.

When the subject was first raised in March of that year by my noble friend Lord Herries the terms which he employed in his speech led us to suppose that the exception which was taken by Roman Catholic Peers to the Declaration rested mainly upon what Lord Salisbury very properly called the "language of indecent violence" which is to be found in it; and when Lord Herries, in that speech, used the phrase that the desire of Roman Catholics was that the offensive words should be removed, we, the Members of the Committee, understood that it was to the terms of violence that the expression was applied and not to the repudiation of any particular doctrine. It may have been our fault, but I think other members of the Committee will bear me out when I say that it never occurred to those of us who served on the Committee at that time that anything more was demanded of us than the deletion of those particularly offensive expressions.

Now, the issue is a perfectly clear one. It is at any rate admitted by noble Lords who are Roman Catholics that a Declara- of some kind may be necessary, and the one point at issue is whether that Declaration should contain a specific repudiation of one or two particular Roman Catholic doctrines, or whether no repudiation should appear in it at all. I confess that I am disposed to agree with noble Lords who think it may be found exceedingly difficult to arrive at a form which will stamp the Sovereign as a Protestant without some words of repudiation. What, my Lords, is the definition of a Protestant? A Protestant, I suppose, would describe himself as a member of the Catholic Church who repudiates or protests against certain doctrines which he considers to be accretions upon the Catholic faith; and how, without naming what those accretions are, he can justify his name of Protestant is to me a question of some difficulty. But I do most freely agree that if a form of words could be found which would satisfy ordinary public opinion—I will not say extreme Protestant opinion, but ordinary public opinion—that the Protestant character of the Sovereign was safeguarded by them, I should certainly say that those terms ought to receive the closest consideration from your Lordships' House.

And then the question which the noble Marquess has dealt with arises, how are any further proceedings to be taken in this matter? The noble Marquess gave reasons against the appointment of a Committee to deal with the subject. Well, I am inclined to agree with what fell from my noble friend behind me, that it would be better if His Majesty's Government would undertake the task themselves. They are in a position to obtain the best expert opinion on the subject, they can receive representations from Roman Catholic Peers and from other noble Lords, and from all other persons who are interested in this matter to an extent which I think it would be somewhat difficult for a Committee of your Lordships' House to do. If a Committee were to allow general evidence from religious bodies of all kinds, I fear it would find its task not merely long and troublesome, but also of a kind which would be likely to stir up a good deal of ill-feeling in the country. I should have thought it would have been possible for His Majesty's Government, working, so to speak, behind the scenes, to receive the matured opinions of those most qualified to speak on behalf of different religious bodies, and they would then be able to come down to the House and tell us whether they had been able to get over this particular difficulty of the form of words, and whether they had found it possible to devise some means of ensuring the Protestant character of the Declaration without including the repudiation of different doctrines. It is impossible for us to support the Motion of the noble Duke as it stands; but if he will agree to strike out the last few words of it, stopping at the word "amended" in the third line from the bottom, it appears to me that the Motion might then well appear upon the Journals of your Lordships House, and it would be an encouragement to the Government to proceed with the matter. I may point out that by the omission of the words after "amended" the Motion does not bind your Lordships House either one way or the other, either to include or to strike out the repudiation of specific doctrines.

THE LORD BISHOP OF BRISTOL: My Lords, I desire to put before your Lordships a consideration to which no reference has been made, and to make an appeal in the interests of persons whose sensitiveness has been, and is, very seriously wounded. But first, I should like to say a word on another point. Those who know the history of the language of the time are perfectly aware that the word Protestant is a positive and not a negative term. The authorised version of the scriptures makes that perfectly clear. The same statement is true when you look back to the history of the word. In a catechism of 743, the curious question is put, "What is the value of the proposal," to certain persons named? The answer is, "the power of protesting," and it may interest your Lordships to know that the Bishop's power of protest was worth that of 240 ordinary taxpayers. In the actual wording of the Bill of Rights and the Act of Settlement there is no sort of antithesis between Protestant and Catholic. Your Lordships are perfectly aware that Protestant as an adjective is in antithesis to Popish, and Protestant as a substantive is in antithesis to the Papacy.

But I wish to make an appeal in the interests of those whose sensitiveness has been and is being very seriously wounded —I need hardly say that I mean the members of the Church of England. There are two sides to this question. I sympathise most heartily with the noble Duke and all of his communion in this House, and I shall be very glad indeed if, in the ripeness of time to which the noble Marquess at the head of His Majesty's Government has referred, we could, with one accord, join in getting rid of the objectionable words in the Declaration. But there is another side to the question. We of the Church of England are under the ban of the spiritual sovereign of the other communion; I am assured that all of us are excommunicated. Do your Lordships know what this means? I will read the actual phrase printed in a London newspaper at the time of the death of Archbishop Benson. I apologise to the noble Duke and to the noble Marquess opposite by name, and to all Members of your Lordships' House for having to read such a sentence from the gutter Press of the time—

> "An old heretic absolutely hung round with a catena of interdicts and excommunications, whose sole hope of salvation rests upon a miraculous and invincible ignorance of God's truth."

Then, again, as a Bishop and priest of the Church of England, I am told by the spiritual sovereign of that communion, and in our own generation, that my orders are invalid; that the members of the Church of England have not been rightly confirmed, nor have ever received the Holy Eucharist, and, from the Sovereign downwards, we are all excommunicate and withwithout sacraments. I say that my whole soul revolts against that most terrible statement as being as insulting to me as anything complained of by the noble Duke can possibly be insulting to the members of his faith.

One more example. Take the case of mixed marriages. In our own generation there has been a serious change made in this matter. I remember the time when, if a Roman Catholic married one of our Church, they went naturally to both Churches; the sons were brought up in the religion of the father, and the girls in the religion of the mother. All that has been changed, and now if a Roman Catholic marries a member of the Church of England he is absolutely forbidden—so I am told by the highest authority—to enter the Church of the other partner, even if for the comfort of that other partner, and to receive the blessings of the Church on the union. I am also told that the requirement now made is that all the children born of such marriages shall be brought up in the Roman Catholic communion. I say, my Lords, that I should be thankful to take part in the ripeness of time in removing the words complained of in the Declaration, but I do say this, that if the time is to become ripe we must bear in mind not only the very sensitive people who feel sensitive, but that we should ask in their sensitiveness whether some regard should not be paid to the sensitiveness of other persons. As far as hardship and insult are concerned, I believe that the Protestants are the aggrieved persons, and it is not from them that any relaxation in the direction indicated should at first come.

Lord HERRIES: My Lords, I should like to say a few words with regard to what has just fallen from the right rev. Prelate. I think he introduced into the few remarks he made to your Lordships matters which are hardly relevant to the question before us. If I was asked to pass an opinion, I should say that I consider he is quite safe, because he is evidently convincingly ignorant. The question before us is, What are we to do in the circumstances in which we are at present? I think we may be satisfied that almost the whole of your Lordships are in favour of some amendment of the Royal Declaration. The only question before us is how far it should be amended, and here I would like to say that I think the noble Marquess the Leader of your Lordships' House is under some slight misconception as to the attitude which was taken up by the Catholic Members of this House when the Bill was brought before your Lordships which proposed to amend the Royal Declaration. Not a single Roman Catholic Peer voted against the Second Reading of that Bill. It is quite true that we complained that our articles of belief were inserted against our approval, but we did not oppose the Second Reading; and, as far I am individually concerned, I should have preferred that the Bill had passed and that the Royal Declaration had been amended in that form than that it should remain as at present. I do not think it is fair to say that we were so hostile to the Bill that it was evident it could not be proceeded with.

I would like to refer to a speech made ninety years ago which, I think, meets the case in point, because we are told that it is absolutely necessary that certain specific doctrines of the Roman Catholic Church should be condemned in order that the public might be sure that the King was a Protestant. The words I would quote were by Mr. Canning. I do not think anyone will consider that Mr. Canning was in any way inclined to the Roman Catholic religion. In 1813 Mr. Canning said that to continue these enactments against transubstantiation when it was no longer, as it once was, a symbol of dangerous politics, was as absurd as that of having had occasion to advertise a runaway felon and to describe him by his red hair, you should for all time characterise red hair as a crime. The Protestant Succession is sufficiently secured without any condemnation of this sort.

After the speeches we have heard to-day I must say I am rather inclined to assent to what has been proposed by my noble friend Lord Crewe, namely, that the noble Duke should leave out the words after "amended" and be satisfied if the House would adopt his Resolution down to that word; and if, after this, your Lordships would go further and agree to the Amendment which is to be moved by the noble Lord on the Cross Benches, Lord Stanmore, I think the end which we have in view, which is that this matter should be further considered, will be attained. I have risen for the purpose of appealing to the noble Duke to be content with moving his Resolution down to the words "shall be amended," and to appeal to your Lordships to agree to the proposal to be submitted by Lord Stanmore, so as to secure the appointment of a Committee to consider this matter.

THE DUKE OF NORFOLK: My Lords, after the expressions of opinion we have heard I think it is clear that the vast majority of your Lordships do feel that a change must be carried out. The Government shrink from the responsibility of doing it, but hope people in private may mature things so that some action on their part might become more possible than the noble Marquess regards it at present. I do not know how my noble friend Lord Jersey would regard the Motion if I accepted the suggestion to leave out all the words after the word "amended," and whether he would then withdraw his Amendment. I feel the justice of what Lord Jersey said. He said, in effect, "We all wish to amend this. Why do you insist on committing us to the statement that nothing will be accepted which includes the condemnation or repudiation of specific doctrines? Why not leave it to a Committee to deal with the matter?" I feel the force of that, and therefore I do not wish to press my Motion to a division and try to commit your Lordships—partly because I think it is clear you are determined not to be committed—to the statement in the latter part of my Motion. I do not know what position Lord Jersey would take up if I accepted the suggestion which has been thrown out by Lord Crewe.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (The Earl of HALSBURY): My Lords, I intervene only for a moment to deprecate the alteration of Motions by suggestions made across the floor of the House, the full effect of which may not be immediately apparent. The suggestion is that all which appears in the earlier part of the Motion should be retained, and only the last three lines omitted. It will be observed that in the earlier part of the Motion it is stated that—

> "Whereas, in addition to these securities, the Sovereign is required, immediately after his accession, to make a Declaration, commonly called the Declaration against Transubstantiation, which is deeply and needlessly offensive to many millions of loyal subjects of His Majesty, this House is of opinion that the Declaration aforesaid ought to be amended."

I am quite sure that I speak truly the feeling of a great number of our Protestant fellow-subjects when I say that any amendment which would negative the positive disavowal of the Roman Catholic faith would be what this country would not accept, and acceptance of this suggested Amendment would be an assumption by your Lordships that that is what the country would accept. What the Protestant people of this country desire is that there should be a Declaration such as no honest person could take if he were a Roman Catholic, and which therefore forms an additional security for the Protestant Succession. I do not wish to go into what happened on the previous occasion, but I think Lord Herries is a little mistaken in regard to what took place in connection with the abandonment of the Bill by His Majesty's Government. My noble friend Lord Llandaff expressly stated, and his statement was not repudiated by anybody at the time, that he would prefer that the coarse and violent language in which the Declaration was contained should be retained than that it should be so amended that it should still retain the power of repudiating doctrines of the Roman Catholic Church; and it was upon that that my noble friend the late Lord Salisbury stated that it was impossible for His Majesty's Government, in the circumstances, to endeavour to pass the Bill. It appears to me that the acceptance of a new form of Motion to-day would be dangerous, and I hope your Lordships will not acquiesce in any such course.

THE DUKE OF NORFOLK: My Lords, as I have already stated, I am prepared to withdraw my Motion in favour of the Amendment of the Earl of Jersey. It reaffirms the opinion of your Lordships' House that the Declaration ought to be amended, and I trust that it will be followed by the acceptance of Lord Stanmore's Motion, and that the Government will appoint a Committee.

Words inserted.

Resolution, as amended, agreed to.

*LORD STANMORE: My Lords, I now rise to move the Amendment of which I have given notice, namely, that a Select Committee be appointed to consider whether any unnecessarily offensive words may not be expunged from the Declaration without incurring the danger contemplated. My Motion as it appears to me, is the only logical and reasonable complement and fulfilment of the Resolution which the House has just adopted. That Resolution contains two propositions, the one that the King's Declaration made upon his accession ought not to contain words unnecessarily offensive; the other that nothing should be done to impair the security of the Protestant Succession to the Crown. But there the Resolution stops. The only logical conclusion to it is to attempt to find some mode of reconciling the two propositions there put forward. That task I believe to be not impossible, and easier, instead of more difficult, now than it was a year ago.

The noble Earl who moved the Resolution which has now been adopted, said, among other things, that it was not for him to say whether this was or was not the time suitable for appointing a Committee of Investigation. Why not, I should like to know. The noble Earl is as independent a Member of your Lordships' House as any noble Lord present, and it is surely as open to him as it is to any other of your Lordships to say whether in his opinion the formation of a Committee to discuss this question is desirable or undesirable. I cannot conceive why he should leave that point without an expression of opinion of his own. But, however that may be, we have advanced, I think, some way towards agreement. The offensiveness of certain of the expressions used in the King's Declaration is admitted generally by Members on both sides of the House and of all shades of opinion. On the other hand, the opinion of the House that nothing should be done to impair the security of the Protestant Succession is equally clear. Therefore it remains to be seen by what process we can best arrive at harmonising those two propositions. Surely the way in which that could be most effectually effected is by the constitution of a Committee of this House—a Committee not like the one which three years ago sat for a few minutes to consider a previously prepared document brought before it to be adopted almost without discussion, but a Committee upon which representatives of those who feel aggrieved by the expressions in the Declaration should be present — upon which Prelates of the Established Church, which is said to be threatened by any alteration of the Declaration, should also sit—a Committee composed of men from both sides of the House, impartial and experienced, who would give, not ten minutes or so, but a full and careful consideration to the question what words could be expunged without danger, and what words could be retained without offence.

Personally, I should be glad to see the Declaration altogether abolished, because I regard it as a mischievous anachronism—an anachronism, because the main object of its imposition upon the Crown was to prevent the exercise by a Roman Catholic of executive power then personally exercised by the King. But that executive power the King no longer exercises. It is now exercised by the Cabinet of the day, and if there is really an apprehension on the part of the British public against entrusting executive administration to Roman Catholic hands, that Declaration which the Sovereign makes should be required also from every member of the Cabinet on his becoming a confidential adviser of the Crown. But, as a matter of fact, that apprehension is no longer entertained. People are not now so sensitive as they used to be as to Roman Catholics occupying this or that office. There is hardly any of the highest offices of the State to which a Roman Catholic may not now aspire, and during the last twenty years no less than three different Secretaryships of State have been held by Roman Catholics. One of them held the Home Secretaryship, in which Department the executive power of the Crown in almost all that relates to executive administration in this country is vested. Those powers were admirably administered by a Roman Catholic, namely, by my noble friend Lord Llandaff. And what was the result of that appointment? Was there a panic created throughout England? Was there a general alarm at this executive power being placed in the hands of a Roman Catholic? Not at all. It was regarded with the utmost calmness. It caused no ruffle on the surface of society. Everybody knew that the interests of the Crown were as safe in those hands as in those of the sternest Prostestant.

But that is not the question before the House. I have stated my personal opinion that it is clear that the great majority of this House, and I believe the great majority of the country, desire that a Declaration of the King's Protestant belief should be retained. The only question then that remains is to render that Declaration as little offensive as may be to members of another faith. Now, if such a Committee as I have suggested be appointed, I think it would not only be not impossible, but really not very difficult, to arrive at a form of words which, on the one hand, would ensure the Protestantism of the King, and, on the other, would remove from the Declaration all that is offensive to Roman Catholics. I cannot understand, I confess, the position of the Government on this question. My noble friend the noble Marquess [Lord Ripon] and the most rev Primate, the Archbishop of Canterbury, say it is for the Government to initiate this matter. But the Government do not seem to accept that responsibility.

I hold that you will find in such a Committee as I have suggested the easiest, the best, and the safest way of arriving at an agreement or of discovering that an agreement is impossible. If the Committee do arrive at an agreement this question is then harmoniously settled, which your Lordships may be well assured the mere passing of the noble Earl's Resolution will certainly not effect. That Resolution will certainly not set the question at rest permanently. If, on the other hand, the Committee should really find out that the Protestant Succession to the Crown rests on so narrow a basis, on so insecure a foundation, that the omission of two or three words from the Declaration is likely to bring it to the ground with a crash, then at least those who object to any alteration will have a better ground for maintaining their argument than they have at present. I say, therefore, that in the interests of both parties the appointment of such a Committee is desirable. I would only add that it seems to me the conduct of His Majesty's Government with regard to this matter like that of a spoilt and pouting child. They have said, "We acknowledge that something should be done, we have proposed something to you to be done, but as you have rejected our prescription you shall not try any other." I say, now that the Government prescription has gone, let us try the prescription of referring the matter to a large Committee, well and carefully appointed, and let them thresh the matter out by seriously considering what words are justly objected to, and what words must necessarily be retained. I beg to move the Amendment standing in my name.

Amendment moved—

"To add the following words to the Resolution, 'and that a Select Committee be appointed to consider whether any unnecessarily offensive words may not be expunged from the King's Declaration without incurring such danger.'"—(Lord Stanmore.)

LORD TWEEDMOUTH: My Lords, I must confess that I regret the line which His Majesty's Government took with regard to the suggestion of my noble friend Lord Crewe, namely, to omit the last three lines of the noble Duke's Motion; and if the noble and learned Earl on the Woolsack will allow me to say so, I doubt the accuracy of his suggestion of order in that matter, because both in this House and in the other

House, I have known cases constantly happen in which, by leave of the House, movers of Resolutions have been allowed to slightly alter the terms of those Resolutions before they moved them.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: The noble Lord is mistaken. I never said it was out of order.

LORD TWEEDMOUTH: I beg the noble and learned Earl's pardon. I misunderstood him. I am sorry His Majesty's Government did not see their way to accept the amended Resolution in preference to the one moved by Lord Jersey; and for this reason, that the amended Resolution of the noble Duke would have given some definite conclusion for the House to arrive at. By passing that Resolution the House would have distinctly affirmed the desirablity of amending the Declaration as it now stands. The Resolution that we have now before us to amend, moved by Lord Jersey, suggests nothing at all. It leaves the whole question hung up without any suggestion being made. That, I think, is unfortunate, because from what I could gather, listening carefully to all the admirable speeches that have been made in the House to-day, there is practically unanimity that it is desirable, if possible, to amend this Declaration. I therefore say, my Lords, that it is almost the necessary consequence of our debate that further steps should be taken by way of appointing some sort of inquiry, whether it be by a Committee of this House or a Joint Committee of both Houses, or by a Royal Commission, to determine what further steps should be taken and whether some agreement could not be arrived at between the parties.

The noble Marquess said he thought that before the Government could consent to a Committee there should be some definite sign of a drawing together of the various parties to this discussion. I think my noble friend, Lord Herries, has to-night given a very considerable indication that there is such a drawing together. I think his speech distinctly showed that there was a desire on the part of the Catholic Peers, as voiced by my noble friend, to endeavour to come to terms with other parties in this House who desire to see the Declaration amended. I am not, of course, in a position to speak with authority in the matter, but I should hope very much that, supposing a Committee either of this House or of the two Houses was constituted, we should find Catholic Peers willing to take their seats on that Committee and to give to it the benefit of their advice and knowledge. On all grounds I would earnestly press on His Majesty's Government to complete the work of to-night by consenting to such a step being taken as will secure a further consideration of the matter from all its lights, and with the assistance of all parties.

THE DUKE OF NORTHUMBERLAND: My Lords, I agree with almost every word in the earlier part of the speech of the noble Lord who has just sat down. The noble Lord told us that we were in the awkward position of having come to a Resolution which had no definite conclusion, and then he went on to recommend that the Resolution should be the basis of the appointment of a Committee. I should have drawn just the opposite conclusion, and should have ventured to urge that if this House thinks it right to appoint a Committee to consider so grave and important a subject as this, it should give that Committee some much clearer mandate than it can find in the Resolution now before the House. Although the noble Lord who has just sat down does not attach any importance to the argument, I confess I am very much impressed by what has been said by the noble Marquess the Leader of this House as to the absolute necessity, before anything can be done in this matter, that some rapprochement between the various parties should be arrived at. I am not at this hour going to detain your Lordships with any further remarks, but I wish to take the opportunity of testing the feeling of the House upon this question, and therefore I venture to move "the previous Question." I trust we shall be willing to adopt that course as marking on the one hand our sense of the importance of the subject, and on the other our utter incapacity of dealing with it at the present moment.

Moved, The previous Question.—(The Duke of Northumberland.)

LORD TWEEDMOUTH: I submit that Lord Stanmore's Motion does give a distinct mandate. It says—

> "To consider whether any unnecessarily offensive words may not be expunged from the King's Declaration without incurring such danger."

THE LORD PRIVY SEAL (The Marquess of SALISBURY): My Lords, perhaps it is due to the House that I should explain the view His Majesty's Government take of the Motion which has been made by the noble Duke (the Duke of Northumberland). I do not agree with the criticisms which have been made by the noble Lord opposite (Lord Tweedmouth), nor do I agree with the criticisms of the noble mover of this particular Amendment. Lord Tweedmouth seemed to think that the Resolution to which the House has just come was an unsatisfactory Resolution. I cannot agree with him. It seems to me to be an expression of the opinion of the House in very felicitous language. In the first place, we express the opinion that we do not desire to see anything in the Declaration which is offensive to our Roman Catholic fellow-subjects, and, on the other hand, we assert our conviction that nothing must be done to injure the security of the Protestant Succession.

Neither can I agree that His Majesty's Government have failed to provide any prescription for the ill which the whole House admits. It is well known that on the last occasion—namely, last year—on which this subject was discussed in your Lordships' House, the then Leader of the House (the Duke of Devonshire) declared that the offer which the Government had previously made was still open, if that offer recommended itself to those who were interested in the subject. And, my Lords, that brings me to remind your Lordships that that offer was the outcome of the recommendation of a Committee. Well, the offer failed. That is to say, we have tried a Committee, and a Committee has not succeeded, and now we are asked to try another Committee. The Government naturally hesitate before assenting to the appointment of a Committee, which course has already been prescribed, and has failed to effect a cure. But we do not desire, of course, to take such an attitude as would absolutely close the door. My noble friend, the Leader of the House, has already explained to your Lordships that he is not without hope that an approximation of view between the two extreme sides of opinion on this question may be brought about, and I can assure your Lordships that if any such communications as the noble Marquess referred to reach His Majesty's Government, we shall receive them with the greatest respect, and with every hope that they may lead to a settlement. But it is clear we have not reached that point yet.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: Why not?

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: The noble Lord opposite asks me why not. I have explained to him that there is no such approximation of view at present. If the noble Lord wishes me to go back into the arguments which have just been engaging your Lordships I will do so, but I think it is clearer from the speech of the noble Earl (Lord Crewe) than from that of anybody else, that there is a profound difference of opinion as to the way in which this subject ought to be approached. The noble Earl explained that what was essential in the Declaration as it stood was dissociation from the Roman Catholic position; that is to say, the mere assertion of adhesion to the Protestant faith was not, in his opinion, sufficient.

*THE EARL OF CREWE: What I said was that, like the most rev. Primate, I found it difficult to conceive the possibility of finding words which would express the Sovereign's adherence to the Protestant faith without such repudiation, but I said that I hoped such words could be found.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: At any rate, the noble Earl experienced great difficulty, and nothing that had been said in this debate had solved the difficulty, in his opinion. I think, therefore, that I am justified in saying that the difficulties have not been swept away, and that the time for appointing a Committee has not arrived. We shall cordially support the proposal of the noble Duke behind me, which will have the effect of not closing the door, and will at the same time prevent your Lordships from arriving at any decision.

*THE LORD ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY: My Lords, I should like to say a single word as to the ground on which alone I can support the noble Duke's Amendment. It is because the Government suggest that it is the best course for us to pursue, with a view to arriving at a solution of what is an admitted difficulty. If I understand rightly the speech of the noble Marquess who has just sat down, His Majesty's Government accepts the responsibility of ultimately having to deal with this matter, provided the preliminary steps can be taken which they have themselves suggested. That being so, I certainly think that we ought to adopt their advice as to the mode in which it is desirable to proceed. But if the previous Question means shelving this matter altogether, and saying that we are not to hear any more about it, and that those epithets which we all regard as so undesirable are to remain in the Declaration, then I could not vote for the noble Duke's proposition. It is on the other understanding that I shall be prepared to vote for it.

THE DUKE OF NORFOLK: My Lords, as I understand it, the House has now distinctly affirmed the principle that it is desirous that no expressions unnecessarily hurtful to Roman Catholics shall be contained in the Declaration. Having brought this matter forward, I feel bound to express my thanks to the House for having affirmed that, although it falls short of the decision I had hoped might have been come to. It seems to me that the obvious thing to do now is to appoint a Committee. That is the only logical position. If His Majesty's Government shrink from that, and if, as I understand, they pledge themselves——

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE dissented.

THE DUKE OF NORFOLK: I understood the noble Marquess, the Lord Privy Seal, to say that if a rapprochement could be brought about which would produce something like a settlement, His Majesty's Government would consider it, and do their best to secure its realisation.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: What was said as to the position of His Majesty's Government in regard to a rapprochement was that, if conclusive evidence of such a rapprochement were within our knowledge, we should then be prepared to consider the question of appointing a Committee, but that in the absence of such evidence we felt bound to oppose the Motion of the noble Lord.

VISCOUNT HALIFAX: My Lords, I should like to observe that the noble Marquess, the Lord Privy Seal, can hardly be aware of the terms of the amended Declaration as brought before the House by the Committee of 1901. If he will refresh his memory on that point, I think he will see that the amended Declaration was very nearly as objectionable as the original Declaration; and it was more objectionable in one respect. It is sometimes more possible to put up with something old which you have inherited, and for which you are not responsible, than to put up with something new for which you are responsible; and it certainly appeared to me that the result of the labours of the Committee, as shown in the Declaration which they brought forward, was at all events in that latter respect much more objectionable than the Declaration we have been considering to-day.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I did not say that the amended Declaration was perfect. My point was to call attention to the fact that the prescription of a Committee had been tried and had failed.

VISCOUNT HALIFAX: Yes, but I would point out to the noble Marquess that it does not follow that, because one Committee has failed, a wiser Committee would not succeed. I should like also to remind the noble Marquess that there is a most remarkable circumstance connected with this whole subject, and that is the difference between what people say in public and what they say in private. I have not met anyone in private who has not admitted that the Declaration is offensive and superfluous, but when they come to talk about the matter in public, they appear to be so dreadfully intimidated by the fear of Orange opposition that they lose all their common sense. It has been mentioned already this afternoon, but I think it might be mentioned again, that at this particular moment there is nothing whatever to prevent every single Member of the House of Commons and of this House being a Roman Catholic.

There is another fact to which I should like to draw attention, which throws a good deal of light upon the sincerity of the arguments which have been adduced, and upon the real weight that lies behind them. I believe that most of the Noncomformist bodies, to whom much of the opposition to this proposal is due, and certainly the great mass of the Liberal Party have all committed themselves to the position that to impose a test upon any teacher in any school supported by public funds is a thing not to be tolerated. Look at the consequence of that in regard to a teacher who is to teach religion. That teacher may be a Roman Catholic, and yet no danger arises to the child ; but in the case of the King, who teaches nobody, and whose religious opinions will not affect, probably, a single one of his subjects, we are at once told that the whole situation is in danger if the King is to be—what ?—to be relieved of his Coronation Oath ? — No—to be relieved of the provisions of the Act of Settlement ?—No, but merely to be relieved of a test which is admitted to be offensive, which is not necessary, and which puts the King in a most disagreeable position, compelling him to do that which is most disagreeable and offensive, not only to his Roman Catholic subjects, but, despite the presence of the right rev. Prelate who spoke a short time ago—the Lord Bishop of Bristol—to all well-instructed Christians, who are not the victims of ignorance and prejudice.

Last year we heard with very great pleasure a statement from the most rev. Primate the Archbishop of Canterbury that he did not think it impossible to devise a form of words which should not condemn or repudiate specific doctrines, and we hoped, after that statement, that the most rev. Primate, in conjunction with the noble Duke who brought this subject before your Lordships to-day, might have been able to arrive at such a modified Declaration as might be passed by the agreement of the whole House. I ask, if such a course is a desirable one, and one which we all wished to see carried out, how can we arrive at it except by the appointment of a Committee ? I earnestly hope your Lordships will see your way to pass the addition moved by the noble Lord on the Cross Benches, for it is not to the credit of this House that an important question of this kind should be pushed on one side for fear of opposition which has only to be looked in the face for it to be seen how little importance there is in it.

Draft Scheme of Charity Commissioners for Whitstable Charities.

MR. SLACK (Hertfordshire, St. Albans): To ask the hon. Member for Tonbridge, as Parliamentary Charity Commissioner, whether his attention has been called to the local opposition to the draft scheme of the Charity Commissioners for the Whitstable Charities, in the county of Kent, in which the income originally provided for the payment of teachers' salaries is to be applied to the maintenance of the buildings of the Whitstable and Seasalter national school; and whether the Commissioners will abstain from sanctioning and sealing the scheme until they have heard the views of the Whitstable Urban District Council and of the local education authority.

(Answered by Mr. Griffith Boscawen.) The Commissioners are making a scheme for the purpose of determination under The Board of Education Act, 1899. At the request of the trustees, and of the Board of Education, made by letter of 12th March, 1903, they consented to embody in the scheme arrangements for raising money to effect a necessary enlargement of the school. These arrangements, and the plans for the new buildings, were submitted by the Commissioners' desire to the Kent Local Education Authority. The Commissioners were, on 23rd February, 1904, informed of the formal approval of the plans by the local education authority and the Board of Education. The scheme was duly published, and a copy sent to the Whitstable Urban District Council on 29th April last. No objection was received by the Commissioners, and the expenditure has accordingly proceeded, with their sanction, and it does not appear possible to raise now any question as to these arrangements, but, subject thereto, no diversion of the money applicable for teachers' salaries is effected by the scheme.

Transfer of Powers of Irish Harbour Commissioners to the County Councils.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE (Wexford, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he would have any objection to introduce a short Bill this session, giving the Irish Local Government Board power, by Provisional Order, to transfer to a county council any of the powers, duties, and liabilities of any harbour commissioners or trustees (except the commissioners of Royal harbours) in cases where such a transfer is agreed to both by the county council and by the trustees or commissioners.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) I beg to refer the hon. Baronet to Section 20 of The Local Government (Ireland) Act, 1898, and to the powers of the Board of Trade under the general Piers and Harbours Acts. No further legislation in reference to the matter appears to be necessary.

Delay in the Publication of Consular Reports.

MR. YOXALL (Nottingham, W.): To ask the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he will explain why delay in publication till 27th June took place in connection with a Consular Report from Malaga received at the Foreign Office on 19th May, with a Consular Report from Persia received on 16th May, and with a Consular Report from Ningpo received on 27th May; and whether he will endeavour to expeite the publication of such Reports.

(Answered by Earl Percy.) The date of publication was Saturday the 25th of June. The delay was with the printer, whose attention will be called to the matter, but it is no doubt due to the fact that the chief pressure of the year occurs at this time.

Scales for Weighing Letters in Sub-Post Offices.

MR. NANNETTI (Dublin, College Green): To ask the Postmaster-General whether, in view of the fact that in small districts where sub-postmasters earn on an average about £7 a year they are compelled to provide at their own expense scales and weights for use in weighing letters, while spring balances are supplied by the Post Office for weighing parcels, he will order that weights and scales shall also be provided in such sub-post offices free by the Department.

(Answered by Lord Stanley.) It was formerly the rule to require sub-postmasters at offices of the class mentioned to provide weights and scales for weighing letters; but for many years it has been the practice for the Department to supply these articles when the circumstances appeared to justify such a course.

Remuneration of Irish Sub-Postmasters.

MR. CULLINAN (Tipperary, S.): To ask the Postmaster-General if he will state the amount of remuneration annually paid to sub-postmasters in Ireland, with and without money order and telegraph offices attached.

(Answered by Lord Stanley.) I am obtaining this information, and will communicate it to the hon. Member.

Customs—Promotion of Junior Assistant Clerks for Special Checking Work.

MR. CLAUDE HAY (Shoreditch, Hoxton): To ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware that in the Statistical Department of the Customs several junior assistant clerks have been awarded a special checking allowance of £30 per annum; that these clerks have less than seven years service, and that they have been selected for this promotion, passing over many senior assistant clerks of approved character and ability, with three times their length of service; and, if so, whether he can give any special reason in explanation.

(Answered by Mr. Victor Cavendish.) I am informed that there have been three such selections, and that the junior assistants clerk were so selected because they were more capable than any on the list of senior assistant clerks.

LICENSING BILL (PROCEDURE).

THE PRIME MINISTER AND FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.), on rising to move the Resolution of which he had given notice for the expedition of the Licensing Bill, was received with loud cheers and counter-cheers and cries of "Gag."

*MR. SPEAKER: I hope that throughout this debate, which obviously causes considerable excitement, hon. Members will refrain from using other than purely Parliamentary expressions.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think, at all events, I can promise that nothing I shall say this morning will add to the excitement the effects of which you, Mr. Speaker, deprecate. Before I enter on the arguments which I hope will convince the House that the Motion I am making is a reasonable and necessary one, may I say, by way of preface, that in the manner in which it has been placed on the Paper—that is, as to the amount of notice given—the Government has not been open to the criticisms which have been freely made against it? We have been accused of violating all the precedents in respect of the shortness of the notice given to the House and the consequent inconvenience imposed on hon. Members who may have desired to give notice of opposition or to consider the course they should take when the Motion is introduced. I was very much startled by a statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Aberdeen, and I have since looked up the precedents. It will not take a moment, if the House will allow me, to run through them. I find that in the case of the Crimes Act of 1887 notice was given at the commencement of the sitting of 9th June and the Motion was moved on 10th June.]

MR. JOHN ELLIS (Nottinghamshire, Rushcliffe): But there is a good deal of difference between giving notice in the afternoon and after midnight.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: In the case of the Parnell Commission Act of 1888 notice was given on 1st August and the Motion was taken on 2nd August. In the case of the Home Rule Bill of 1893 notice was given (the terms not being settled till the afternoon) on the 28th day of the month and the Motion was made on the 29th. In the case of the Evicted Tenants Bill of 1894 notice was given in the afternoon of 30th July and the Motion was moved on 31st July. It will be seen, therefore, that we have far exceeded the notice given in the case of all these precedents; and, although I do not wish to base myself on precedents, I should be sorry if the House remained under the impression that any unusual course has been taken now against their interest. If there has been a departure from precedent, it has been in the direction of extending and not restricting the amount of notice given.

In moving this Resolution I do not propose for one instant to discuss the merits of the Bill which we have had under consideration. It would be out of order. It would not only be out of order, it would be wholly irrelevant to the argument which I propose to address to the House; for I do not think any hon. Gentleman is competent, if I may respectfully say so, to give a judgment on the Motion I am now proposing, unless he considers that Motion in relation to the whole course not merely of Parliamentary business in this session, but in any session. And it is because on the broadest principles I believe there is no course open to us but that which I have adopted that I am now asking the House to adopt it. It is no new opinion of mine—it has been an opinion often expressed in this House, and it has been an opinion of predecessors of mine of greater authority — that the Parliamentary machine cannot be expected to work smoothly, efficiently, or reasonably if too great a tax is put upon it as regards the time to which its sessions extend or the labours with which those sessions are occupied. In my judgment, and speaking broadly, I think six months and a half is quite as much time as it is wise to ask the House of Commons to give to its work. I think it would be most foolish to lay down a fixed day, as is the rule in some foreign countries, when our labours should come to an end. I quite agree that exceptional circumstances may arise when we may profitably but unfortunately drag on our deliberations to much beyond the period I have suggested; but that period, with the exception of the Education Bill year, has been the normal period, or about the normal period, since 1896. It is far in excess of the labour imposed in France, in Germany, and in Italy on the Parliaments of those respective countries; and I am convinced that no worse service could be done to the House of Commons than to ask it to undertake an average of business that would extend, roughly speaking, not only beyond the six months and a half I have spoken of, but to some indefinite period that might extend—as, indeed, on one occasion it did extend—not only over the remaining months of the year in which the session started, but far into the year succeeding.

If that general proposition be accepted, and I do not think it will be denied, surely this second proposition will be accepted by any man who considers in a calm and reasonable spirit the conditions under which we carry on Parliamentary legislation. These six months and a half must be devoted, of course, to more than one subject—I will classify the subjects in a moment—but everybody must admit surely that a reasonable portion of the time must be granted to the Government of the day for carrying through its legislation. Of course, if the Government of the day brings forward some enormous and impossible programme—I do not mean in the sense of unreasonable, but impossible in point of size—and endeavours to thrust this down the throats of the House of Commons—if we are guilty of the charge of having brought forward, or of being desirous of thrusting down the throats of the House of Commons, a programme of unreasonable size, then I think there would be a valid reason against the Motion I am now proposing. Now, how are you going to allocate the various kinds of business the House has to deal with in the course of an average session of six and a half months? I will venture to say that perhaps the first and most important business is the function of criticising the administrative action of the Government that happens to be in office; and I think that any attempt to unduly shorten the time for this function for the purpose of passing great legislative measures, be they good or bad, is to be deprecated. But while giving full play to the duty of criticism, there must be a limit to the function of criticism if you are going to sit only six months and a half and are going to legislate and are manifestly going to be occupied in something besides comments, reasonable and fair though they be, on the administration of the affairs of the country. Consider what time we spend upon this during the session. I will classify the occasions. There is, first, the debate on the King's Speech, there are the debates in Supply, on adjournments of the House moved at Question time, discussion upon Motions of adjournment for the holidays, and debates on votes of censure. These are the occasions when criticism takes place. The next call upon the time of the House is that made in the interests of private Members—I do not mean in reference to private Bill legislation, but public business proposed by private Members; and I think the House will admit that, having done our best to put the rights of private Members on a fair and solid basis, having regard to the time at our disposal, we have faithfully adhered to the compact—I will not say compact—the arrangement arrived at when the Rules were revised. In no single case has the Government this session trespassed on a Tuesday, Wednesday, or Friday upon which a private Member by the Standing Orders has had a prior claim. That is the second great block of work that has to be done. The third is the Budget; and the fourth is ordinary legislation. In regard to the Budget I will say a word in a moment, I mean in relation to my argument. Well, I will say it now, that the House may see the line of argument I am trying to develop. There are times when it would be absurd not to distinguish the Budget from ordinary legislation. The great death duties Budget of the right hon. Gentleman opposite was a case in point; it was legislation of the most novel and most controversial kind, which it might be quite right to pass, but which for business considerations must be regarded as part of the controversial work of the year; but, without going into its merits or demerits, that surely cannot be urged against the Budget this year. There must be a Budget to deal with the year's finance if the money obligations of the Government are to be fulfilled; and I do not think that financial business could be carried on or obligations fulfilled by a less controversial method than that adopted by my right hon. friend. I do not do more than touch upon this, but I think every fair-minded man will recognise that I am not wrong. Having thus classified the business of the session, it is manifest that the time you give to one department of our activity must in proportion be taken from another. If the House insists on spending night after night on criticism, the time to be given to the consideration of legislation must thereby be curtailed. It is not a matter for argument, it is a simple question of addition and subtraction.

In the light of these general propositions, let the House consider the course of business this session. Before Easter we had one afternoon sitting, and one afternoon sitting alone, which we were able to devote to legislation, all the rest of the time was entirely taken up by what I have described as criticism. Between Easter and Whitsuntide we had seven afternoon sittings for legislation, and since Whitsuntide we have had twelve afternoons for legislation. In my opinion that is too little. I know that an hon. Gentleman who interrupted me earlier thinks the House has not had enough time for criticism and that everything that for the moment stemmed and diverted the flood of criticism, anything that saved here and there an afternoon for legislation and has prevented it being used for purposes of criticism has been an afternoon wasted. I do not deny that criticism of a Government may be reasonable and useful; all I say is, if you consider the burden upon Parliament, the time has been in excess of that which should be given to it. I will not say it has been couched in improper language, or that it has been on improper subjects, or that it has been of a kind that an Opposition in the carrying out of its constitutional functions should not make on the Government in power; but I do say, and say emphatically, if you are only going to allow the Government to have one afternoon before Easter for legislation and if between Easter and Whitsuntide you allow only seven, and when the course of business subsequent to that has been of the character which is fresh in every hon. Member's recollection, then I say you are making an apportionment of the time given to us for our work on wrong principles, which does not allow enough for legislation and gives too much for the element of criticism. Of course, as I have said, there is one qualification of the general principle I have laid down which must never be absent from the minds of hon. Members on either side. Repeating what I said earlier, while you must give reasonable time for legislation, it is on the other hand the duty of the Government not to ask the House to attempt a too great legislative task in the time available. If this Motion were brought forward to enable us to pass one Party measure after another, a series of Government Bills to which the Opposition strongly objected, if we attempted to force such Bills through the House of Commons by the method to which I have now unhappily to ask the House to assent, that would be an unreasonable and tyrannical use of the power of a majority. Can any reasonable man who looks at our programme of legislation think that so far as controversial Bills are concerned we are throwing an undue burden on the House, or that the Resolution I am asking the House to pass to-day is an undue attempt to make light of the task of Parliament, or that I ignore the desire for fresh air and exercise we hope to realise somewhere about the middle of August?

Now let me pass on to consider the work before us and our means of accomplishing it if this Resolution is carried. Let us suppose—it is not, I know the time for a statement on the Government programme—let us suppose, for the sake of argument, that there are only two Bills which can be certainly said to divide the House on strictly Party lines, the Licensing Bill and the Defaulting Authorities Bill. Let us suppose these are the two Bills. I have not made any statement about business, I am laying before the House a hypothesis which I think will enable them exactly to understand the position in which we stand with regard to business, and it is on that position, and that position alone, that I rest this morning my argument for the Resolution before us. On the hypothesis that the only controversial Bills are the Licensing Bill and the Defaulting Authorities Bill, I do not myself think it is possible that the House should rise before its ordinary time—12th August. On that hypothesis, will anybody say that is an unreasonable amount of legislation? I have never known hon. or right hon. Gentlemen opposite, when they were in the place which we now occupy, content themselves with so modest a programme. Hon. Gentlemen seem to think it is relevant to this argument that they happen to dislike both these Bills, if they do, as I think they do. But we have usually disliked the Bills that hon. Gentlemen have brought in; and I see no prospect of that happy day of harmony coming when the Opposition, from whichever side of the House they may be drawn, will rush into the lobby in support of controversial measures brought forward by their opponents. The argument is altogether outside the merits or demerits of a Bill, or whether a Bill is liked or not. Nobody can deny, even if we restrict our controversial proposals to these two Bills, that the session will be at least equal to a session of ordinary length. I claim that the House has a right to deal, favourably or unfavourably as it chooses, with these Bills; and I claim further that the Government which allows itself to be defeated by time on measures of that character and in the circumstances on which I have endeavoured to rest my appeal to the House—I think that the Government which allows itself to be beaten by time, would really be unworthy of the responsibility which rests upon it.

I have little more to say except to point out to the House, with regard to the particular Bill to which this Resolution refers, that it is, if I may venture to say so, wholly absurd to say that it will be otherwise than adequately and fully discussed by this House under the Resolution. I am not going to minimise the importance of the Bill, because I think its importance is very great; but it does not embody many novel principles. It embodies the principle that existing licences, whether they be ordinary licences or whether they be ante-1869 beer licences, should not be taken away without compensation. Nobody can say that that principle has not been adequately discussed. It embodies the principle that new licences should only be granted under conditions which would prevent a monopoly growing up—a most important principle, but one on which there is no division of opinion between the two sides of the House. We have already settled in debate the modification of magisterial jurisdiction; we have already discussed in Committee the time limit; we have already discussed in Committee the important, but what I will venture to call the subsidiary, point of tied houses, and the basis of compensation; and the general policy of the Government as to new licences has, of course, been before the House more than once. I therefore entirely deny that the fundamental principles of this Bill, the principles which make it approved of on this side of the House or disapproved of on the other side of the House, have not been thoroughly thrashed out and that in the time still left in the compartment provided by this Resolution there will not be ample and adequate time for dealing with the strictly subsidiary points which may still remain to be discussed. But let the House remember this. The question before us is not whether particular speeches have been too long or too short, or whether particular Amendments were reasonable or unreasonable. The question is not whether the House could not go on discussing this Bill for weeks or months without irrelevancy, without anything which in the narrower use of that word might properly be described as obstruction. An ingenious friend of mine has made a calculation which seems to show that, if the progress of the Bill in the future is to be precisely upon all fours with its progress in the past, it will take exactly a year and a quarter to pass it. I do not know whether that calculation, were we to allow a year and a quarter, would prove to be below or above the mark, but I earnestly deprecate allowing a year and a quarter, or anything like it, because I think it would mean absolute ruin to debates in this House. When the right hon. Gentleman who moved the closure by compartments on the Evicted Tenants Bill came down and, in a ten minutes speech, recommended that proposal to the House, I remember that in his peroration he insisted upon taking up the Paper of Amendments and saying:—"If you want justification for this Motion—circumspice." The Amendments which so frightened the right hon. Gentleman with regard to the Evicted Tenants Bill consisted only of 22 pages. There are now 65 pages of Amendments on the Paper with reference to the Bill which we are now discussing. I do not doubt that these 65 pages will prove highly prolific and will have a progeny not less numerous than themselves.

The House will see now the grounds—not irrational grounds, I think—on which I venture to ask them to pass this Resolution. It is described, and from one point of view accurately described, as a curtailment of the liberties of this House. But unless the House will consent voluntarily to certail its opportunities of discussion, I venture to say it is perfectly impossible from time to time to avoid passing a Resolution of this kind. There is one thing worse than this species of curtailment of the liberties of the House, and that is that we should become a wholly impotent Assembly, carrying on endless debates month after month, wearisome to ourselves, nauseous to the country, and destructive to the dignity and efficiency of this Assembly. I do not deny that such powers as I am now asking for may be abused. I do not deny that Governments to come, as Governments in the past, may come down to the House and ask for powers of this character which would indeed be a dangerous attack upon the liberties of the House. Each case must be judged by the House on its merits; and if the time should come, as perhaps it may, when other Ministries are in power, if they find themselves within six weeks of the normal termination of the session, having had but a relatively insignificant amount of time allowed them for their legislation, and if the programme that they put forward is as modest in point of bulk as that which we have pressed upon the House, I do not see myself how it would be possible for the House not to feel, as I feel now, that it is in the interests of this Assembly that some such step as this should be taken to prevent the evils which otherwise would ensue.

Sir, I do not propose to claim for this Party the possession of greater virtues than those I see so amply exhibited upon the Benches opposite. It may be that we shall also ask for night after night on the King's Speech, for one evening after another spent in discussions on the Adjournment of the House, and for all the opportunities of criticism which have occupied us since 2nd February, when we met. But if that occasion should occur, then, but then only, would they come down to the House with the kind of justification which I claim for the Resolution which I ask the House to accept. I am perfectly certain that if we desire to retain the place that we have hitherto held in public estimation one of two things must be done. Some Leader of the House must come down with a general scheme of distribution of the business which shall avoid the evils I have endeavoured to detail to the House or else from time to time, very rarely I hope, but inevitably now and then, those responsible for the conduct of business, from whatever side they are chosen, will feel, however unpleasant the necessity may be—and it can be pleasant to no man—that they will be compelled to come down and ask the future House of Commons for the same powers which I now with some confidence ask this House to give us.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the proceedings in Committee and on Report of the Licensing Bill shall be brought to a conclusion in the manner hereinafter mentioned on six allotted days—

"(a) The proceedings in Committee on Clause 1 on the first allotted day.

"(b) The proceedings in Committee on Clauses 2 and 3 on the second allotted day.

"(c) The proceedings in Committee on Clause 4 on the third allotted day.

"(d) The proceedings in Committee on the remaining clauses of the Bill, and on any new Government clauses, and on schedules and any new Government schedules, and any other proceedings necessary to bring the Committee stage to a conclusion on the fourth allotted day.

"(e) The proceedings on Report on any new clauses and on Amendments to Clauses 1, 2, and 3 of that Bill, be brought to a conclusion on the fifth allotted day; and

After this Order comes into operation, any day shall be considered an allotted day for the purposes of this Order on which the Licensing Bill is put down as the first Order of the Day:

At 11 p.m. on the said allotted days, or if the day is a Friday at 4.30 p.m., the Chairman or Speaker shall put forthwith the Question or Questions on any Amendment or Motion already proposed from the Chair, and shall next proceed successively to put forthwith the Question on any Amendments moved by the Government of which notice has been given (but no other Amendments) and on every Question necessary to dispose of the allotted business to be concluded on the allotted day.

In the case of Government Amendments, or of Government new clauses or schedules, he shall put only the Question that the Amendment be made, or that the clause or schedule be added to the Bill, as the case may be.

"At 12 midnight on the day on which the Third Reading of the Bill is put down as first Order, or, if that day is a Friday, at 5.30 p.m., the Speaker shall put forthwith any Question necessary to conclude the proceedings on that stage of the Bill.

"Proceedings to which this Order relates shall not be interrupted (except at an Afternoon Sitting at 7.30 p.m.), under the provisions of any Standing Order relating to Sittings of the House:

"After the passing of this Order, on any day on which any proceedings on the Licensing Bill stand as the first Order of the Day, no dilatory Motion on the Bill, nor under Standing Order No. 10, nor Motion to postpone a clause, shall be received unless moved by the Minister in charge of the Bill, and the Question on any such Motion shall be put forthwith. Nor shall any opposed Private Business be set down at the Evening Sitting for consideration on any of the allotted days or on the day on which the Third Reading of the Bill is put down as first Order.

"If Progress be reported, the Chairman shall put this Order in force in any subsequent sitting of the Committee."—(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

MR. ASQUITH (Fifeshire, E.): In rising to move the Amendment which stands in my name, I am not going to criticise in detail but I shall traverse from top to bottom, from beginning to end, the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman—a proposition which I tell him frankly at the outset is, in our judgment, an outrage upon the dignity and liberties of the House of Commons. Sir, the right hon. Gentleman occupied much the larger part of his speech with a disquisition which seemed to me to have very little relevancy indeed to the question, upon the possibility of a more philosophic, a more artistic, distribution of Parliamentary time. But there was one serious fallacy, unperceived apparently by the right hon. Gentleman, latent in the whole of his argument, viz., that the persons who are responsible for the distribution of Parliamentary time are not the persons who sit on the Bench opposite. Why, the right hon. Gentleman tells us that we have spent a great deal of time in criticising the administrative action of the Government. So we have. But criticism must bear some proportion to the area of criticisable matter, and if a Government provides such an unexampled provision, as His Majesty's present advisers have done, of material for criticism in every quarter of the globe, and in every branch of administration, this House would surely be failing in its duty if it did not attempt and agree, with no slow and laggard steps, to keep pace with the abnormal activities of those who are responsible for the government of the country. But what opportunities have the Government given us for discussing their legislation? Take this very Bill—the Licensing Bill, the capital measure of the session, as the right hon. Gentleman himself admits. It was not introduced until the 20th of April. The Motion for the Second Reading was not made until the 9th of May, and here we are on the 1st of July—having spent nominally six, but in reality something like three Parliamentary days on it in Committee. It is that mismanagement of the Parliamentary business, of the Parliamentary time—it is that tardy and delaying treatment of subjects which the Government asked the House to believe to be of capital and national importance, it is that, far more than prolixity or exuberance of speech on one side of the House or the other, which has brought Parliamentary business into the intolerable muddle which the right hon. Gentleman comes here to-day to confess and for which he asks the House to provide him with arbitrary means of escape.

I must say one more word about this matter of time. On how many evenings were the first hour or two at any rate, deliberately frittered away by Gentlemen opposite, docile and most convenient followers of the Government, in order that time might be given to others to transact their other avocations before coming here to perform their Parliamentary duties? We have read in the ordinary means of communication, of the almost despairing appeals which have been made by the Government Whips to get their men to come to do their duty, and the not obscure menace of the Prime Minister, that if they did not do so they would be sent to the country to answer to their constituents. I am not sure whether these Whips have been very effective so far. I cannot help contrasting the full and animated appearance of the Benches opposite to-day, when it is not a question of getting on with the business of the country, but of curtailing the facilities for discussion in this House and of accelerating the advent of the holidays, I cannot help contrasting the appearance of those Benches now with that which they presented on many an evening during the discussions on the Finance Bill and on the Licensing Bill itself.

I want to avoid following the example which the right hon. Gentleman has set, and to come to close quarters with the actual proposal he has made. The right hon. Gentleman has dealt in a very light and offhand fashion with the question of precedents, and I venture to say that there is not a single one of the not very numerous cases in which this sort of procedure has been resorted to, by one Government or another, which affords any colour or pretext for the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman. In every case but that of the Evicted Tenants Bill the Bill under discussion had been in Committee for twenty or thirty days, and I think, in one instance, for more than thirty days. That was not so in the case of the Evicted Tenants Bill, I agree. But what was the reason? The reason given by my right hon. friend, who then led the House, for the drastic proposal he made, was that it was in the interests of social order. It was because it was believed by the Government, and by the majority of this House at that day, that, unless that Bill was promptly and expeditiously passed, the cause of social order in Ireland would be in serious danger. That single exception stood on its own legitimate footing. But there is not a single case in which a Minister has come to this House to ask for such powers, without any attempt to prove that there has been something in the shape of organised obstruction. Our discussions in Committee on this Bill — I want the House to realise the facts of the case — we have occupied nominally six days, but in reality the exact time is thirty-four hours. How has that time been occupied? I will give the House some figures which I think will prove instructive. I have them for each of the sittings. At the first sitting there were twenty-five speeches made from the Government Benches, and twenty-three from the Opposition Benches. At the second sitting twelve speeches were delivered from the Government Benches, and eleven from the Opposition Benches. The third sitting hardly counts, for it only lasted half an hour; but at the fourth sitting there were twenty Government speeches and thirty-two Opposition speeches. At the next sitting there were nineteen Government speeches and twenty-six Opposition speeches; and on the last occasion there were thirty-four Government speeches and forty-one Opposition speeches. In other words, during the thirty-four odd hours there were delivered from the Government Benches 115 speeches, and from the Opposition side 135; but a very large proportion — I believe thirty — of the speeches on the Government side of the House were made either suggesting or actually supporting Amendments. It is impossible, in the face of facts like these, to say that any case has been made out for anything in the nature of obstruction. I may say, having sat through the Committee stage of this Bill, and having in that respect the advantage of the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House, that during the whole of my experience in this House, which is that of a great number of years, I never heard more business-like discussions—discussions in which the speeches were terser, more argumentative, and more obviously animated by a desire to grapple with the real difficulties of the case. If that had not been so, we surely would have had a more repeated application of the closure. I do not think, though I know that it has been refused once, that the closure has been granted more than twice; and I am quite certain that any one who has actually observed the proceedings of the Committee will agree that no case whatever has been made out that any point has been more than adequately discussed.

The right hon. Gentleman has given us an imaginary sketch of the points which have been considered in Committee. It must have been supplied to him by somebody else, because he was not here. This is not the occasion to discuss the merits of the Bill; but to show how imaginary that sketch is, let me just call attention to this one fact, that we are at this moment in the midst and by no means near the end of the discussion, of what, I agree, is not the most important but a very important principle, viz., the demarcation of the jurisdiction between the licensing justices on the one side and the quarter sessions on the other. Assuming that the proposed change is made, any man who has followed these debates will agree that it is difficult to say where the one begins and the other ends. The same may be said to be true of a vast number of the provisions that have been discussed. I say, then, in the language of the Amendment I have put on the Paper, that the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman is without any justification in the previous course of the debate. But I will go a step further. It is impossible to ignore, when you are debating a Motion of this kind, the character of the measure itself, and the circumstances under which it is brought forward. I have never been an extreme believer in what is called the doctrine of mandate. I think that under normal conditions, if the country gives a majority to the Government of a particular political Party, it cannot complain if in the course of their term of office they do a good many things that were unexpected at the time they came in. Yes, that is the case under normal conditions. But this Parliament assembled under conditions that were entirely abnormal; and to justify that statement, which I do not make at random, I will recall to the attention of the House one or two of the declarations of the Prime Minister himself. The Prime Minister, speaking in the course of the election at Manchester. used this remarkable language. He said—

> "It was impossible that the country should at this moment have anything in its mind to exclude the paramount interest which events in South Africa necessarily excited. He asked them, whatever their politics might be, or to whatever Party in the State their allegiance had been given, to remember that this election did not turn on any of the old questions which had divided the electorate at previous elections, but it was a new issue governed by a new consideration."

Developing the same point, the same right hon. Gentleman the following night at Preston said to the electors there, speaking in support of one of his own followers—

> "It was not now a question of programmes of domestic legislation; it was a question of Imperial policy; and he could not imagine how any elector, be his previous political career what it might, could hesitate which of the two candidates he should support."

One more quotation, and one only, from a Gentleman who was at that time a Minister of almost equal authority with the Prime Minister himself, the right hon. Member for West Birmigham. He said—

> "He asked for the support, not only of those electors who were ordinarily with the Government for personal or Party reasons, but of patriots, who in a time of national danger put their patriotism before their Party."

This is the reward they are getting! The right hon. Gentleman went on, I am quoting from another speech—

> "In the North of England thousands and thousands of miners who have never voted Unionist before, and still call themselves Radicals and Liberals, on this occasion, even if it were only to be for this occasion, have supported the Unionist candidate. He did not say they had changed their views, they were probably Liberal and Radical as before, and would probably vote for Liberals and Radicals at the next election; but at this election they had voted for the Unionist candidate. Why did they do that?"

MR. JAMES O'KELLY (Roscommon, N.): Because they were fools.

MR. ASQUITH: That was not the answer which the right hon. Gentleman gave. He said it was—

> "Because they saw that the issue at the present time was not a question of domestic policy such as"— he particularised—

> "Church discipline or liquor prohibition, but the question of the existence of the Empire."

Well, I might multiply these quotations ad nauseam, but I will not do so. because what I have read is, I think, quite sufficient to justify the proposition which I am laying down quite apart from any general doctrine of mandate. We have heard that the Parliament was elected in reliance, or very largely in reliance, on appeals of that kind. I have heard the right hon. Gentleman say, when an argument of this kind has been used before, "Oh, look at your own election addresses; did you not put forward a programme of social and domestic reform?" and so forth. Of course we did, but our programme was rejected, and because, as the right hon. Gentleman and the right hon. Member for West Birmingham said, not a few people who ordinarily voted Liberal and Radical, and were in favour of those programmes, deliberately set them aside in the belief that they were going to return a Parliament for a new purpose and for one purpose alone. And what is the state of things to-day? The majority secured in that way, in reliance upon those appeals, I might almost say upon those pledges—that majority, in probably the last session of an expiring Parliament, at any rate, in the fourth year of its existence, is being asked to revolutionise the law of licensing. [AN HON. MEMBER: No.] I am not going to discuss the merits of the Bill, but let me remind the hon. Gentleman who says "No" that the Government did, two years ago, in 1902, introduce a Licensing Bill. I think they had a perfect right to introduce it because it was practically a non-controversial measure. I agree there was no mandate for it, but it was a non-controversial measure, assented to very largely on both sides of the House; and it is incredible, if the Government in 1902 believed either that they had authority or that it was in the public interest to establish the licensing law on a totally new footing, that they would not have made some such proposal at that time. We know very well why the proposal was brought forward. It was done not because we were near the election of 1900, but because we are near the next election. It was done because, as the brewers and their friends showed very clearly last year, unless some legislation of this kind is brought forward it will not be a case of the good Liberals and Radicals voting under the stress of patriotic feeling for the Unionist candidate, but of the devoted followers of the Unionist Government, the publicans and brewers, voting under the stress of their own woes for the turning out of the Unionist Government and the substitution of a Liberal Government.

Now, I venture to assert, and I think the facts I have laid before you justify it, that, whether you look to the character of the discussion which has taken place, whether you look to the nature of the measure itself, or whether you look to the origin and position of the present House of Commons, the right hon. Gentleman's proposal is wholly unsupported by precedent and is a flagrant innovation of constitutional principle and practice. Here I come to what is, after all, the gravest aspect of the matter. We cannot look on this as an isolated proposal. The right hon. Gentleman, at the close of his speech, made some remarks about measures of this kind being necessary for the dignity and efficiency of the House of Commons. I confess I think political cynicism has rarely reached a higher level. I say so because this is only the latest, though I hope it may be the last, of the attempts which have been made under the right hon. Gentleman's initiative, or patronage, I care not which, in the last two years to stifle the voice and paralyse the action of the House of Commons. Parliamentary majorities come and go and Ministers come and go, but there is one thing which hitherto, at any rate, has persisted through all these chances and changes of Party fortune, and that has been the authority and the freedom of the House of Commons. That is a great permanent asset in our national balance-sheet, and it will be an evil day for the future of democracy in this country when the House of Commons comes to be regarded as a mere automatic machine for registering the edicts of a transient and, perhaps, a crumbling majority. What is the record of the present Government in this matter? What is the position in which they stand to-day? They are afraid either to face the country or to listen to the House of Commons. For twelve months the Leader of this House has exploited and exhausted all resources of our procedure to reduce us to a dumb show. Shift after shift, and manœuvre after manœuvre, have been applied to prevent our giving an open deliverance on the greatest of the issues of the day. Not content with that, the right hon. Gentleman, through the ingenuity of some of those who sit behind him, has contrived to erect, step by step, an impenetrable blockade against the free debate of almost every subject of importance. Now, to-day, as a fitting climax to the whole, we are to lose the power of effective criticism for the rest of the session in regard to the largest and most complex of all the proposals of the Government itself. Sir, is the House prepared, at the invitation of the right hon. Gentleman, to take this last step on the road to humiliation and impotence? I trust it is not; at any rate, it is to save ourselves from an ignominious surrender of our privileges, and to save those who come after us from a disastrous precedent, that I move the Amendment that stands in my name.

"In line 1, to leave out all the words after the word 'That,' and insert the words 'this House declines to consider a proposal to deprive the House of Commons, without any justification in the previous course of the debate, of all power of reasonable and adequate discussion in respect of a measure which seeks, in the absence of any authority from the country, to make fundamental and much controverted changes in laws vitally affecting the well-being of the people.'"—(Mr. Asquith.)

Mr. PIKE PEASE (Darlington) said he had listened with great interest to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, but he thought the majority of the House would agree that there had not been a single argument put forward to damage the case which the Prime Minister had put so clearly before the House in one of the greatest speeches he had ever delivered. With regard to the doctrine of mandate, he questioned whether any elector believed that when this Parliament was elected, he was electing a Parliament which would not legislate in the direction of domestic legislation. Everyone knew that Mr. Gladstone himself had fought an election with regard to one great matter and then introduced a number of controversial questions. They also knew that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose Burghs had clearly stated that this Government was justified in legislating with regard to controversial matters. Anyone who had listened to the debates during the last few days would agree that many of the speeches had been made purely for obstructive purposes. [Ministerial cheers and Opposition cries of "Name."]

Everyone who had heard the speech of the hon. Member for Barnsley descriptive of his recent expedition would admit that it could not have been made except for some purpose of that kind. It was well known that Mr. Gladstone and Mr. John Bright were both in favour of compensation for publicans out of the rates, and it was extraordinary that the Party opposite now condemned the policy of getting that compensation out of the licensed victuallers themselves. He sincerely hoped that the House would by an overwhelming majority support the Motion of the Prime Minister.

Mr. LAMBERT (Devonshire, South Molton) said that never in the history of Parliamentary procedure had such a drastic procedure been proposed on such flimsy pretences. In introducing it the Prime Minister had spoken of everything but the Resolution. He had spoken of the opportunities for criticism, but there were hosts of questions that the Government had brought forward which the Opposition could not criticise, and now forsooth, not content with that, the right hon. Gentleman asked the House in this matter to guillotine discussion and prevent it taking place. The whole justification put forward for this Resolution was that it was a most reasonable proposal on the part of the Government. He agreed with his right hon. friend the Member for Fife that such a Resolution applied to a Bill only introduced last April was the last despairing effort of a discredited Minister. What sort of commentary was this Resolution on the new Rules, upon which so much time had been spent in discussion, and which the right hon. Gentleman promised would add great dignity and much efficiency to the debates of this House. All the return they got for the time spent upon the new Rules was that the system of closure by compartments was more stringent than ever. This was the last despairing throw of a political gambler. Had it not been for the political exigencies of the Unionist Party the Licensing Bill would never have been introduced. They were told after the Licensing Bill of 1902 that the licensing laws of this country could not be bettered. Then what did this mean. It meant that the right hon. Gentleman's supporters, the brewers, were going to turn him out of office if he did not accede to their demands. What happened in the case of the Education Act. In that case there was closure by compartments; they were not allowed to discuss its vital provisions and the result was that the Act was not working harmoniously and the rates for education purposes were rising with alarming rapidity. There could be no finality in any legislation passed by this drastic method. No one would suggest that the Education Act was a final measure. It would be amended on the very first opportunity that was given to the country to express an opinion upon it, and no one believed that the Licensing Bill, if passed by means of the closure in this way, would finally settle the licensing difficulty. Another Government would come in at perhaps a not distant period and amend it. The right hon. Gentleman had now a measure before the House in regard to which he did not dare to call a public meeting in the country and in regard to which he was endeavouring to stifle discussion in the House itself, and yet they were told that the proposition before the House was reasonable. It was a perfect scandal to the Parliamentary procedure of this country.

This was one of the most important measures the right hon. Gentleman could deal with. What was the hurry for it. Surely there was no hurry at all, because if, as the right hon. Gentleman promised, the Government would be in power next session, they could bring this measure in then. If that were done the country would have an opportunity to consider it in the autumn. This was a most unreasonable proposition on the part of the right hon. Gentleman, because there had been nothing like obstruction. Members on the Unionist side of the House had over and over again appealed to the Government to make concessions, and the result of the right hon. Gentleman's shutting down discussion had been that those Gentlemen had voted in the Opposition lobby. In every one of the discussions on the education question the right hon. Gentleman had taunted the Opposition with being numerically small, but though the Opposition in the House had been numerically small in the country it had been numerically large. The right hon. Gentleman knew his majority was crumbling away. He did not want to carry the doctrine of mandate too far, but undoubtedly at the last election the electors were asked to vote on the question of the war. Since then, however, the Government had upset the education of the country, and had not won very much prestige thereby, and now they were trying to upset the whole licensing system by giving compensation where it had never before been granted and by interfering with the discretion of the licensing magistrates. In view of the fact that they now proposed to carry their Bill by the drastic method of the closure, every common-sense man should protest against their action to the utmost of his power.

SIR MARK STEWART (Kirkcudbrightshire) desired in a few words to explain why he intended to support the Motion of the Prime Minister. He was one of those who could not go all the way n supporting the policy of the Licensing Bill, but he intended to vote for the Motion, because he thought it was necessary to give the Government that power and influence in the House of Commons without which they could not carry on the business of the country. There could be no doubt that the House of Commons did not possess the prestige in the country it formerly enjoyed, and that was not due to any wrong-doings of the present Administration as hon. Members opposite seemed to think. He thought the mischief dated back to 1880–86. when the first marked difference was made in the treatment of the House, and the conduct of the then Government had left a far deeper impression on arliament than any act of any subsequent Administration. If the House was to have power to do its work they must pass the Resolution of the Prime Minister. It was ridiculous to say that the Bill could not be dealt with in six days. There were proposals in the Bill to which he was opposed, but he had no apprehension that he would be shut out by the Motion from stating his objections to them. The last speaker had had a good deal to say about the mandate of the last general election. He would remind the hon. Gentleman that whenever an election took place the candidates, in their addresses to the electors, dealt with a variety of matters which were of general interest but it was not to be expected that any man would exhaust the list of subjects of possible legislation during the life of a Parliament. It therefore did not follow that because a question was not mentioned in election addresses, it ought not to be dealt with by Parliament. In view of the near approach of the end of the session and of the large amount of business remaining to be transacted he thought they ought to give the Government the whole of the time of Parliament, not that they might get away for their holidays in good time but in order that they might secure that health and strength necessary to enable them to properly perform their duties to their constituents.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean) said the hon. Baronet the Member for Kirkcudbright had suggested there was no danger that Parliament would not be shut out from discussing questions of vital interest on the Bill. He would like to have the ruling of Mr. Speaker as to how far it would be in order to discuss, not the merits of the Bill, but the extent to which the Motion would shut out the consideration of parts of the Bill. He, for one, had up to the present taken no part in the discussion, either on the Second Reading of the Bill or in Committee. He had not put down a single Amendment, but there was one part of the measure on which he felt very strongly. So, too, did many of his constituents. It was a great mistake to suppose that the Bill was supported generally by the licensed victuallers. At certain pleasure resorts and in beautiful parts of the country, licensed victuallers held under conditions of tenure binding them to restrict the sale of intoxicating drinks. The principal hotel in his own constituency was held under a lease which directed the tenant to do his utmost to prevent the sale of these drinks. Yet these men who would gain nothing from the Bill were to be taxed under it. The Prime Minister had told them that under his plan the Bill would be adequately and fully discussed.

He added that it did not embody any novel or important principles.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am quite sure I never said that.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE said if the right hon. Gentleman had used words he had not wished to, he would not hold him to them; but he had said also that the basis of compensation under the Bill had been before the House several times. His contention was that the Motion of the Prime Minister would have the effect of excluding the basis of compensation from discussion, because it was included in a portion of the Bill which had not yet been reached, and was not likely to be reached under the plan. He must repeat that, in the opinion of those who conducted licensed houses in pleasure resorts and beautiful places, the Bill would throw upon them an excessive charge. They were men who did not make profit out of drink; they got their living by entirely different means, and their grievance could not possibly be laid before the House if the Motion were carried; for the Motion would exclude from discussion the most difficult and complicated clauses of the Bill—the schedule, and the clauses affecting the schedule. The Prime Minister must bear in mind that the debates of this Bill had only extended over a few hours, and that the discussion throughout had been careful and business-like. Some of the most important parts of the Bill had not been reached, and it was because the Government proposal would prevent their discussion that he was opposed to it.

*MR. HENRY HOBHOUSE (Somersetshire, E.) said that, as a supporter of the Bill, he found himself quite unable to vote for the Motion. It was not because he thought that such a Motion was never justified, for he agreed with the Prime Minister that every case must be dealt with on its merits, and he was one of those who without hesitation supported the Resolution to enable the Government to bring to a more rapid close the debates on the Education Bill. But the circumstances of this case were entirely different. Up to the present he had made but one short speech on the Bill, because the points in which he was chiefly interested occurred in the latter part of the measure. He desired to see the Bill passed, if it were modified in certain important respects, so as to advance the cause of temperance. But at the present stage of the proceedings on the Bill, they were not warranted in taking any such drastic steps as were proposed in the Motion of the Prime Minister. With regard to the suggestion that the Bill had not been fairly discussed in Committee——

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I never suggested that.

MR. LOUGH (Islington, W.): Then why this Resolution?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If the hon. Gentleman listened to my speech, he would know. I carefully abstained from even suggesting that there was obstruction.

DR. MACNAMARA (Camberwell, N.): Then why move this Motion?

MR. JOHN ELLIS: Then there was no obstruction?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It was absolutely unnecessary to my argument to say whether there was obstruction or not, and I did not suggest it.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I thought you did.

*MR. HENRY HOBHOUSE said he would pass from that point, merely saying that the questions which had been discussed were important, and in his opinion an unreasonable amount of time had not been given to them. The fact that the closure had not been resorted to showed that the ordinary resources were not exhausted, and his contention was that in the interests of good legislation the necessity for this Resolution must be proved up to the hilt before it could be agreed to. The only strong or plausible reason for bringing forward the Resolution appeared to be the fact that they had now arrived at the month of July. But, after all, the Licensing Bill was the principal measure of the session, and very little time was given to its discussion in the month of June. Surely it was not very satisfactory from the point of view of Parliamentary business that one of the most important weeks in the session, in the middle of June, should be given up to the discussion of the details of a Bill such as the Scotch Education Bill, which might with common consent have been sent upstairs and discussed in a friendly and business-like manner. He felt strongly on the subject, because in certain quarters, and especially in certain newspapers, there was a tendency to bring discredit on Members of this House and their business-like capacity by suggesting that for social reasons they postponed their most important Parliamentary business. He sincerely hoped that no ground would be given for such suggestions. With regard to the character of the Bill, he sometimes thought the Government themselves did not rate the importance of the measure too highly. Many Members on the Government side thought it a measure of quite second rate importance for protecting a few publicans from a few cranky magistrates, but he believed it was far worse than that. The Bill went to the very root of the licensing system. It was an admission that the system of annual licences, which had prevailed for so many years, had practically broken down, and that it was necessary to introduce the recognition of a longer interest. It provided not only for compensation for the extinction of licences, but also for the creation of new licences under new terms. The measure excited very strong feeling in the country among many earnest men, both Churchmen and Nonconformists, Conservatives and Liberals, who believed that if the present occasion for the advancement of temperance reform were lost, it would be very difficult, with this Bill in operation, to advance that cause in the way they and, he believed, the majority of both sides in the House thought it ought to be advanced. For these reasons, if for no others, he thought the Bill was worthy of somewhat prolonged discussion.

What did the Government propose? Under the Resolution one day was to be given to the discussion of the conditions under which new licences should be granted, whether they should be annual or for a term of years, with or without compensation, whether the surrender of licences should be regarded as a legitimate or as an objectionable operation, and also the extent to which they should encourage the system which many people believed would turn out to be the most hopeful line of temperance reform, viz., the granting of licences to companies which had a disinterested view as to profits. All these matters would have to be discussed within the limits of one Parliamentary day. Under these circumstances did it not stand to reason that legislation in this House became somewhat of a farce? He could not help regarding the proposal as a severe blow not only to the power of private Members but also to the credit of the House of Commons. He protested against the general system of Parliamentary procedure, under which matters were allowed to drift—he did not refer to any particular Government more than another—during the first three quarters of the session, and a huge mass of undigested legislation was forced through in the dog days, sent up to the other House in the month of August, when it could not possibly receive proper consideration, and this House was held responsible for the exact form in which that legislation was turned out. Measures such as that now proposed should be the last resource in extreme cases. The ordinary closure ought to be tried first. If things were as bad as the Prime Minister had stated, let the Standing Orders be altered so that all measures were sent upstairs for consideration in detail by Grand Committee. That was a strong measure, but it would be justified if matters were as bad as his right hon. friend had described. At the worst he suggested there should be an autumn session. That would be extremely hard on members of the Government, but he thought it ought to be resorted to before the House decided to omit all discussion of important principles and questions in a Bill which excited great public interest throughout the country.

There was one other consideration which might well be considered by his hon. friends. In this Resolution were they not forging a grand weapon for a future Radical Government? He could not conceive Governments with a large popular majority behind them, anxious to make the best use of their time, bringing forward a number of drastic proposals, and, by a Resolution similar to that under discussion, forcing those proposals through at the point of the bayonet. It would not do for his hon. friends to rely too much on the other House. If a Radical leader brought forward a scheme for imposing additional taxation on land, or further taxes on public-houses—a very likely consequence of passing the present Bill as it stood—there would be no appeal to another place. This Resolution was therefore a most dangerous weapon, and was not warranted by the circumstances. As to the Bill itself, if no reasonable facilities were given for discussing the various important questions which remained, many of those who voted in favour of the Bill on the Second Reading would have to consider very gravely whether they should not take a different course on the Third Reading.

*Sir JOHN LENG (Dundee) said that as he had not contributed to the discussion on the Bill he might say a word as to the genesis of the measure. It seemed to him that it was entirely in the brewers' vat. By the Amendment of which he had given notice he had intended directing attention to the almost complete absence of a public demand for the measure. The Report on Public Petitions just presented gave the figures from 2nd February to 24th June. It appeared that the number of Petitions against the Bill had been 6,659, with 224,872 signatures, while only one Petition, with 253 signatures, had been presented in favour of the Bill. Moreover, there had been 3,394 Petitions, with 55,064 signatures, against the alteration of the law with regard to the renewal of licences, which was the main proposal of the measure. Hence there had been 10,000 Petitions, with 300,000 signatures, presented against the Bill, and only one, with 253 signatures, in its favour—a fact which, if any regard whatever was to be paid to Petitions, should carry some weight with the right hon. Gentleman. He had also directed the attention of the Prime Minister to a declaration signed by the heads of all our Universities, and the heads of settlements in the East End, both male and female, who had devoted their lives to this most important work for the betterment of the working classes in the East End. All these people were most earnestly and seriously interested in the social welfare of the people, and he asked the Prime Minister whether, after receiving such declarations signed by persons of great influence and authority, he had modified his views upon this Bill. The right hon. Gentleman had said that he could not understand how temperance reformers, if they desired a reduction of licences, could take the attitude they did. They were all in favour of the reduction of licences, and a large number of them were in favour of the principle of compensation, but what they strongly objected to was that this Bill placed a limitation upon the discretion of the magistrates, a discretion which they had enjoyed for centuries.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member is going into the merits of the Bill.

*SIR JOHN LENG: The opposition to this Bill came from all quarters, and from many social organisations. Reference had been made to the protest of the Bishops; but the right hon. Gentleman paid very little regard to that. This Bill had been put forward as a measure of temperance reform, but he would remind the House that the National Temperance Federation had recently passed a Resolution entering its indignant protest against the proposal of the Prime Minister to apply closure by compartments to the Licensing Bill, and the Resolution invited the House of Commons to vote against this attempt to curtail the discussion of a measure of such vital importance to the community. So far as the opinions of the masses of the people were concerned, the right hon. Gentleman did not think much of them, and he did not appear to think much of the recent Hyde Park demonstration. There had been demonstrations against the Bill all over the country. The demonstration in Hyde Park was held by the working people themselves, who knew how much they were affected by this question. But, however much the right hon. Gentleman might disregard the masses of the people now, when the time came he would find that he would have been much wiser if he had disregarded the menaces of the brewers and publicans and paid some regard to the opinions of the people. He regretted that the Prime Minister had shown so little consideration to ethical, social, and philanthropic influences. From a political point of view it might be well for the right hon. Gentleman to use this closure to stop debate in the House, but by so doing he was only arousing a stronger feeling against the Government throughout the entire country. When the time came for the right hon. Gentleman to submit his policy to the country, he would find that not only in regard to this measure, but also in regard to the Education Bill and other measures, and in his attempt to reduce representation in the House of Commons to a mere nullity and make it a mere machine for recording the decisions of the Cabinet he had entirely miscalculated the views of the people in this matter.

*MR. EMMOTT (Oldham) said his right hon. friend the Member for East Somersetshire had told the House the reasons why he was unable to support the Resolution moved by the First Lord of the Treasury. The hon. Member was a man of ability and of experience, he spoke with authority, and was respected on both sides of this Assembly. The reasons which the hon. Member advanced for the course he proposed to take were reasons with which he entirely agreed. He proposed to comment briefly on only two of them. There were two specific cases that the right hon. Gentleman had mentioned in which the Government had either made mistakes or might have, by a different arrangment of business, given reasonable and adequate opportunity of discussion with regard to the Licensing Bill, always supposing they regarded the measure as one of first class importance. The right hon. Gentleman complained of the mismanagement of the business of the House in the past, as, for instance, in Ascot week, when they brought forward the Scotch Education Bill, a Bill which might have been sent to a Grand Committee, and thus have reduced the time occupied by the House. Again, if the Government really desired to get this Licensing Bill, why did they not have an autumn session for it as they did in the case of the Education Bill? Surely, if they attached so much importance to the Bill, they should give time for its adequate discussion, and not force it through after totally inadequate attention by the House. It had been asked why the House of Commons had not now the same authority in the country as it had in the past. He was found to say that the House had lost its authority chiefly during the period that the Government of the country had been Conservative and Unionist. He did not, however, attach particular importance to that. The question was whether that loss of authority was from a permanent or a temporary cause. He did not think the House need be so despondent as they sometimes were in this matter. There had been two changes in the conduct of business in the House. One was that the present Prime Minister attended much less in the House during debates than any of his predecessors, and that fact had a great influence upon business. The other was that the measures of the Government were unstatesmanlike. As to the opposition given from the Liberal side to the Education Act, it was perfectly justified by the fact that the Act was not working satisfactorily in the country, and that one part of the country was practically in open revolt against it. The Opposition called the Education Bill an unstatesmanlike measure, and he thought they would be found in the course of history to have been justified in that view, and therefore lengthy opposition to it must be allowed to have been justified.

The real question was, could the House give adequate discussion to the Licensing Bill in the time allowed by the Motion of the Prime Minister? He did not think they could, because they had never been able to come to grips upon the question yet. It took some days for one side of the House to appreciate the position of the other side, and he felt sure that the Prime Minister had not that grasp of the views of the opponents of the Bill which he would have if he attended the debates regularly. He agreed with the Prime Minister when he said he did not regard precedent as of much importance. It must be remembered in reference to the precedents which arose during the period of the Liberal Administration that after all there was a consideration of some importance affecting Liberal measures which did not appertain to those measures emanating from a Tory Administration. That consideration was that there was a House of Lords which, when a Liberal Government was in office, was more or less a deliberative Assembly, but which he thought in the case of a Unionist Government did to some extent abdicate its functions. He thought that the precedents of previous Unionist Governments with regard to the proposal now before the House were wholly and entirely against the Prime Minister. He did not set great store on precedents. As the Prime Minister had said, they must decide each question on its merits. There was no question that the matters dealt with by the Licensing Bill did require discussion. The Bill referred to one of the most important social questions of the day. There was no disputing the fact that the considerations connected with licensing were amongst the most complex relating to any social question of the time. Having regard to the enormous amount of misery and crime which resulted from the undue use of intoxicating liquors, there was no doubt that this was an important and complex measure. This Bill attempted to introduce a new system and to fix a perpetuity of tenure for licence-holders hitherto unknown to the law. It did so on the ground of justice, but it seemed to him that the justice stopped at the brewers. There was no justice for the public and very little for the publican in the Bill as drawn. These were matters which required the close scrutiny of the House, and to which the House could not give adequate attention if the Resolution of the Prime Minister were passed.

He did not wish to press the question of the mandate to any undue length, but he must point out in regard to a moribund Government, like this, bringing forward a question of great complexity which was extremely obnoxious to many temperance reformers, that the only way they could bring home the facts of the situation to the public was by prolonged discussion in this House, and that was prevented utterly and entirely by the system of closure by compartments. In any system of closure by compartments, and still more in a drastic system of this kind, it was impossible to exercise any pressure upon the Government, for they had only to sit tight during debate and then bring their supporters into the division lobby and they got what they wanted. If they had a reasonably prolonged debate Members on both sides had a chance of pressing their views upon the Government, but under the closure system that was impossible. Without desiring to be offensive to right hon. Gentlemen opposite, he felt compelled to take objection to the way in which the Bill had been conducted. It was not too much to claim for previous Liberal Administrations which had brought legislation before the House that they had on the whole, particularly in regard to their important measures, only put them in the hands of men who had thoroughly studied the subject. He thought the House had some right to complain about the way in which it had been treated by Ministers in regard to this Bill. The Bill was nominally in charge of the Home Secretary, whose efforts in regard to the measure had been mostly noted for his observance of the principle of golden silence ; the right hon. Gentleman had taken, if he might use a vulgar phrase, a back seat in the discussion, and that was a great drawback to the House. Now he came to the Solicitor-General. He noticed the Solicitor - General had had principal charge of the measure. The Opposition would rather deal with him so long as he had adequate power. But over and over again, when he appeared to be meeting them in debate, he was thrown over by the Prime Minister. That operated against efficient legislation in the House. As to the Prime Minister he hoped he did not do him an injustice, but as far as he had followed his speeches in regard to the question, he had never studied it fully and thoroughly. He had heard with a ready ear the complaints of the brewers, but he was absolutely ignorant, as the right hon. Gentleman himself had confessed, of the grave and injurious scandals in his own constituency in regard to the licensing system. He did not complain of the Prime Minister's ignorance except in so far as he had shown his mind was open to one side of the question, and totally closed to the other. That was not the way to get adequate legislation in the House. He thought it ought to be stated in defence of the Home Secretary, that he had another heavy Bill on his hands in Grand Committee. But everyone of His Majesty's Ministers appeared to come to the House with a mind overworked, and distraught by many other questions, and they could not give adequate attention to this great and complex social question which it deserved. No single one of them appeared to have studied, or attempted to study, this most important Bill, as Sir Robert Peel and Mr. Gladstone studied the great measures which they introduced. An hon. Gentleman laughed, because he thought the comparison was not one which could, with any justice, be made. Under these circumstances, it was clear that the Liberal Party must absolutely refuse all responsibility for this Bill. If this Motion was carried they must pledge themselves to reverse it at the first possible moment. They must make it perfectly clear that they did not accept the principle of perpetuity of tenure on any terms, and they would see who was going to win this fight in the long run.

He had only one word to say in conclusion as to the discussion of this question in detail. They had spent two days—fifteen or sixteen hours in all—in the discussion of the time limit raised on a false issue. The Prime Minister might have helped them out of the difficulty, and they might have been able to discuss the time limit in the way they desired if the right hon. Gentleman had not thought it his duty to his Party to chip in at a certain moment and take care that the discussion should take place then, when it was more convenient to the Government, inasmuch as it brought in the question of the time limit in regard to other matters besides compensation. They spent a few hours over the question of the tied houses and that was closured by the Government. They spent a good many hours over the disciplinary question. Hon. Members did not realise the importance of that question until it was discussed in Committee, and that showed the value of having adequate discussion. By discussion they got into the heart of a subject, and they did not know really before they began what were going to be the important and what the unimportant points. On Clauses 2 and 3 there were six or eight questions — he need not enumerate them—of very great importance, any one of which would occupy in the ordinary course at least one day's discussion. They were all put into one day by the Prime Minister's Resolution. They could not get reasonable legislation on such a principle as that. But most serious of all was the wider question of the degradation of the House of Commons. He admitted that the closure under modern circumstances must too often be necessary. They all admitted that the closure in itself had a bad effect. He believed that in wise hands the closure might be worked in a way that in the long run would obtain the sanction of the country. But here was a Government which after all was regarded—he did not say on this question but in regard to another question—with great suspicion by two important groups of Members—he supposed they were one half of the nominal supporters of the Government. A Government of that kind which was on its last legs, and which was bringing forward a measure of this importance and complexity on a violently controversial subject, now came in with this closure Resolution in order to make it sure that the House would not get adequate discussion of it. He had only to say that such a course was an outrage on the decencies of debate, and it seemed to him the last despairing effort to capture, at any rate, that portion of the vote which the publican could turn.

Mr. DISRAELI (Cheshire, Altrincham) said the hon. Member for Oldham was hardly fair to the Prime Minister when he said the right hon. Gentleman was unaware of the gross scandals which had occurred in his own constituency. The introduction of this Bill hardly bore out what the hon. Gentleman said. Everybody knew that the scandals of Manchester were the beerhouses which infested that city.

Mr. EMMOTT: Allow me to explain to the hon. Member that I referred to the fact that certain magistrates were influenced by the trade in some way or other, and tried to interfere with the work of the police. Evidently the hon. Member does not know of that, or that they were struck off the Bench.

Mr. DISRAELI said he knew that, but he thought the hon. Gentleman was referring to the state of licensing in Manchester which the Prime Minister by introducing this Bill aimed at doing away with. The worst class of licensed houses were the ante-1869 beerhouses, and he did not think the hon. Gentleman had any reason to hold up the Prime Minister to any extraordinary opprobrium in connection with the introduction of this Bill.

Mr. EMMOTT: I have explained the reason for what I said.

Mr. DISRAELI said he was one of those who voted against the closure on the Home Rule and on the Education Bill, and it was not with a very happy conscience that he should give his vote that day. But he considered that after twelve years in that House one's ideals got rather upset. In this matter one was led, perhaps, more to consider, not the immediate, but the ultimate benefit to the country which would result from the course the Government were now taking. He entirely denied what had been said over and over again in the debate, and especially on the other side—that this was a very difficult and complex measure. The position of the magistrates, to his mind, was left very nearly the same as at the present moment. Their rights and duties were left practically as they were now. Each county and each town would now be able to do away with public-houses which were not required. He thought the result of this Bill would be so beneficial that he would vote for the closure Resolution of the Government, though, perhaps, that action had been taken before it ought to have been taken.

It had been said on the other side that there had been no opposition to the passage of the Bill which had not been fair. He thought the principle of the Bill was contained in the first five or six lines. They discussed that on the Second Reading for several days, and it had also been discussed in Committee. The House having once accepted the principle, the Bill to his mind was one which could be passed, leaving the machinery as it was now to be administered by quarter sessions. The argument that much of the machinery of the Bill would not be discussed if the Resolution now before the House were passed was not a strong one, because most of the machinery was to be carried out by quarter sessions themselves. The principle of the Bill having been accepted he ventured to think that the Government were, perhaps, not doing such a wrong thing as some might consider in forcing the closure at this early stage. He thought the Government might have given a little more time for the discussion of the Bill. He did not mean the sort of discussion that had come from the other side. He did not mean a controversy between brewers and teetotalers and lawyers, but discussion on the issues with which the magistrates would have to deal in their administrative capacity. The fact that it had come to pass that the closure had to be enforced in the way proposed was, to his mind, one of the many condemnations of the new rules of procedure passed by the House. It had been clearly shown that the House could not sit four or five days continuously on a big Bill without hon. Members being placed in a condition of almost physical ineptitude and unfitness to do the work. He hoped the Prime Minister would consider that the surrendering of the Wednesday evening had placed the House in that position. The new Rules had absolutely broken down. To his mind this was a detestable action to take, but it had been adopted before; it had been initiated by the other side. In this case, although he had never voted for closure by compartments before, he would vote for this closure because he believed that the benefit to the country would be greater than the disadvantage or harm done to the House of Commons.

MR. LAWSON WALTON (Leeds, S.) said that the hon. Member who had just sat down had recognised the extreme importance of the Motion now before the House. He had pointed out that it did not involve the mere question of the fate of the Bill which the House was now engaged in discussing, but that it involved the constitutional position and capacity, in its legislative sphere, of the House of Commons, and, if passed, it would establish a precedent which, in the hands of successive Governments, would be used to curtail, to the point of destruction, the exercise of the deliberative functions of the House in framing its legislation. Here they had a Bill, not unduly long, and not unduly complicated, but highly controversial. There seemed to be no ground for putting this measure into an exceptional category, except that it excited strong feeling in the country, which was reflected on these Benches of the House of Commons. There had been no waste of time involved in its discussion during the few hours devoted to it; and if, under the circumstances, they were to come to the conclusion that the machinery of theHouse of Commons was to be acknowledged to be unequal to the strain of framing the measure, then there was no highly contentious Bill to which, in the future, the same argument might not be applied with equal force. He would ask the House for one moment to look at the practical result of this Motion. Were they, or were they not, prepared to declare that, as a body, the House was unfitted to frame its measures? He agreed that that did not involve the declaration that they were unable to define the principles of these measures, because to some extent these were settled by the debate on the Second Reading of the Bills. But the Motion declared when a Bill passed into Committee, if time was short, or if the measure was controversial, or if any elements of complication arose, it was to be taken, not in the form in which Parliament had settled it, but in the form in which the Government draftsman had framed it, and in which the Cabinet had chosen to adopt it? The Constitution had undergone a serious change. It was said that it had ceased to be government by Parliament. It had become government by Cabinet, and an even later development, they were told, had taken place, and it was now government by Prime Minister in Cabinet, little distinguishable from the autocracies into which the democracies of the past had degenerated.

But the present point was not so much the authority of the Cabinet or the Prime Minister in the Cabinet. The question was one which was very near to every one of them, whether they were the enemies of this Government, or any other Government. It was a question for every individual Member of Parliament who was proud of the institution to which he belonged, whether or not the House was to surrender the function of giving its impress, after debate and deliberation, on the form of the measures which it passed. Everyone recognised that the miserable six days which were to be allotted to discussing the clauses of this Bill would involve that whole clauses would be taken en bloc, by some haphazard method; and that other Amendments of the greatest importance, owing to the mechanical application of what the Prime Minister called the time limit, would be shut out; and that they would send to the country a Bill which here and there might reflect the opinion of this House, but here and there would reflect no opinion except that of the Cabinet draftsman. He had had some little experience of the criticism to which Acts of Parliament had of late years been subjected by those whose duty it was to administer them, and the strongest language had been used in regard to the ill-adapted framework by which Parliament had chosen to express its will in the direction towards which legislation tended. It must be remembered there was no tribunal by means of which Bills might be revised and criticised. They became law after passing through Committee. If they had a body of experts who could review and revise legislation, they might have some security, but the only security which Parliament had was in the discussion and deliberation of this House, and if they came to the conclusion that that deliberation and discussion could not be expended on their measures, then they were abandoning one of the most important functions which this House had hitherto exercised. What steps was it proposed to take? The Prime Minister was all for huggermugger methods. The Prime Minister said: "Let the business spin out in a happy-go-lucky way until the allotted period is reached," and when the allotted period arrived, however important the clauses might be, deliberation must be curtailed by this mechanical limit of the compartment. The time limit of the Prime Minister was Procrustean in its application, and the result would be that they would cast upon the country a half-considered and ill-digested measure in respect to which there had been no adequate discussion. The Prime Minister said that Parliament was going to be degraded by the length of time that was expended in the discussion of measures of this kind. But was not the true degradation to be found in the declaration, which they were, in effect, making that Parliament was unequal to the discharge of its constitutional duties?

The Prime Minister had said that they could not in Committee adequately discuss the measures they were to pass; but if that were so, it was the duty of the Prime Minister to offer a true solution of the difficulty. If the situation had arisen that they could not adequately discuss measures in Committee, by whom were they to be discussed? Was a measure to be sent out to the country unconsidered, because, owing to the lackadaisical conduct of the business at an early period of the session, the time which might have been usefully spent on a measure of first-rate importance had been otherwise absorbed? He contended that if that was the present situation of this House as a deliberative assembly, then it was for the Prime Minister as the Leader of the House to substitute for the abandoned functions of the House some other method of adequately considering and deciding upon the framework of their legislation. He did not approach the consideration of this question in any Party sense. This was a precedent which would be established from which there would be no escape. Closure by compartments would be applicable in the future to any Bill. The Prime Minister might get up and say: "This is a highly controversial measure. The time at the disposal of Parliament is limited. It must be passed. The Committee stage must be abridged, and we shall ask the House to send this Bill forth without discussion." The precedent arising out of this debate would be quoted with irresistible force in order to induce their successors to agree to such a Motion.

He could quite understand the Prime Minister making this Motion if there had been anything in the nature of obstruction to this Bill. But the criticism of the measure had proceeded from both sides, and nearly every Amendment which had been moved had been received with sympathetic consideration by the Solicitor-General, who represented the Government. There was scarcely an Amendment which had not been regarded as most reasonable, and in one case, after a large amount of time had been consumed in its discussion, the Solicitor-General came forward with a very important Amendment which he himself put before the Committee. How was the Prime Minister to predict that similar cases might not happen again? What was thought of as mere machinery was apt to involve questions of principle. Was the door to be closed to all fruitful suggestions and modifications or improvements, because forsooth they would not sit after twelve, or because they must have their holidays on the 12th August? The fate of the House of Commons as a deliberative assembly was at stake. The declaration of the Prime Minister that the House would not sit after 12 o'clock at night, or prolong the session beyond the middle of August, to discuss a measure of such prime importance, was a degradation of Parliament, and the right hon. Gentleman who made it would be held responsible for the feeling it would cause in the country. He felt strongly on this matter, and he offered these observations in no Party sense whatever. He hoped that hon. Members on the Government Benches would lift this issue above Party, and say to the Prime Minister: "We think you are mistaken; we are prepared to come and prepared to stay to discuss this measure, which has aroused such popular feeling throughout the country—a measure of which it must not be said outside that Parliament grudged adequate time for its consideration."

SIR JOHN GORST (Cambridge University) said that with the Party aspect of the question at issue he should have nothing to do. He had listened with admiration to the excellent speeches of the First Lord of the Treasury and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Fifeshire; and his memory was irresistibly carried back to days when he had heard the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Fifeshire make a speech from the Treasury Bench exactly like that of the First Lord of the Treasury, and the First Lord of the Treasury make a speech from the Front Opposition Bench precisely like that of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Fifeshire. His object in rising was to protest most earnestly against the application of the principle of closure by compartments to social legislation. He had listened with great pain to the confession of the First Lord of the Treasury that the House was practically incapable of carrying through a measure of social legislation, and that, too, in the case of a Bill where there had been no undue discussion, where even the First Lord of the Treasury himself repudiated the notion that there had been anything like obstruction.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No; I abstained from saying that there was obstruction.

SIR JOHN GORST: At all events the right hon. Gentleman does not venture to allege that there has been obstruction.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: My right hon. friend must not put it in that way either. I was quite ready to allege it if it was necessary to the argument I addressed to the House. It was not necessary, and therefore I did not allege it.

SIR JOHN GORST said he would put it in this way—that in relation to a measure the consideration of which he ventured to allege had been characterised by extremely business-like debate, the First Lord of the Treasury had said that it was impossible for the House adequately to carry on discussion in Committee. Surely, if that declaration of the First Lord was recorded by the adoption of this Resolution, it might be said that the House of Commons had written itself down as incapable, under its existing Rules, of passing an ordinary measure of social reform. Now, would the House consider how these Bills which dealt with the social habits and conditions of the people were framed? They were sometimes prepared in accordance with the Report of a Royal Commission or of a Select Committee, in which event all interests had, at least, an opportunity of being heard. The Bill was therefore prepared with some knowledge of the various points of controversy and with the various interests that had to be considered. But that was not the case with the Licensing Bill. That measure did not follow either the Majority or the Minority Report of the Royal Commission. It was a Bill framed by the Government itself. It would be framed by a number of gentlemen selected haphazard, who necessarily had no greater knowledge of the subject of legislation than anybody else, assisted by permanent officials in the Civil Service, who also were selected at haphazard and who, again, had not particular expert knowledge of the subject under consideration. There were, no doubt, powerful interests and powerful influences who managed somehow or other to get a say in the preparation of Government Bills; but even the most careful Government could never feel certain that all interests had been considered and that all the points in connection with the Bill had been brought under review. No doubt the Bill would be exposed to discussion, but he did not know whether the closure had not been imposed even in the Cabinet itself. Then, finally, the Bill was submitted to the House of Commons. Now, what he wanted to impress on the House was that here, on the floor of this House, for the first time an opportunity was given to every interest involved in the Bill of being heard, and every difficulty had an opportunity of being raised. Had the Government had an opportunity of really considering the operation of their own Bill? Had the Minister in charge of the Bill, who ought to be a person of authority trusted by his colleagues, had an opportunity of so modifying the original proposals of the Government in accordance with the principles laid down, so as to make it acceptable to the House of Commons, and to remove from it the deficiencies which had been shown to exist, and to finally pass through the House of Commons a measure that would be acceptable not only to the Party to which the Government belonged, but to the country at large, and which would work for the benefit of the whole people? In this Bill, he thought, they had an excellent example of the value of discussions in the House, because, during the short time it had been under discussion, he ventured to say that the Solicitor-General had learned a great deal about the licensing laws of this country in their social aspect which he had never known before. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had received criticisms from both sides of the House with great sympathy and consideration and had accepted important Amendments; and he believed that the right hon. and learned Gentleman would have been disposed to accept more Amendments if his zeal had not been curtailed by the First Lord of the Treasury.

Now, what would be the effect of the proposal of the Government? It would undoubtedly be that the Licensing Bill would be passed into law with a great number of points, perhaps points of detail, but of important detail, greatly affecting the happiness of the people and their moral welfare, which had not been submitted to the judgment of the House or had not received the independent criticism of the House, and without the Government having had an opportunity of correcting the procedure. In fact the Bill would rather resemble one of those foreign legislative propositions which went by the name of "ukases," passed not in concert with the representatives of the people, but solely by permanent officials of the Government, and which consequently were not only not obeyed by the people, but gave rise to revolutionary sentiments and occasionally to the assassination of some unpopular Minister. From incidents such as these, this country was happily free, and chiefly because legislation was submitted to free discussion in the House of Commons. The results of a procedure such as was now proposed were apparent in the fact that so many of the Acts dealing with the social condition of the people had by their authors to be made the subjects of amending Bills. Why, even the Education Bill, with the general principles of which he was in entire accord, would have been better if it had been thoroughly discussed in the House, and many other matters which had been decided under closure would have been better had there been full discussion and expression of opinion. On the whole he did not think that there was any real saving of time. Looking beyond the session, no saving of Parliamentary time resulted from Motions such as these; an enormous amount of time would be saved, now spent on amending Bills, if more care were given to the original measures. He was inclined to think that it would be better not to attempt to pass any social legislation at all until the rules of procedure were amended so as to secure that social legislation, at least, should not pass without full discussion. The Prime Minister mentioned the alternative, only to dismiss it, of amending the rules of procedure; but the House would do well to amend them so as to ensure adequate discussion for every social measure. It would not be in order for him to mention particular projects, but in this connection he was a strong supporter of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, who had often advocated the appointment of a strong business Committee, something like the Committee of Selection, chosen from both sides of the House and composed of the older Members, not so much influenced by Party considerations—a strong business Committee to allocate the time to be occupied in various discussions. He could not enlarge upon this idea, but at least it would save the House from the absurdity of attempting to pass social legislation when under its Rules the House might be incapacitated from discussion.

*MR. WHITTAKER (Yorkshire, W.R., Spen Valley) said he confessed he approached the consideration of the Motion with a strong feeling of indignation, and could not discuss general procedure with the philosophic calm of the right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken. From a Party point of view, no more favourable Motion for the Liberal side of the House could be made. The Prime Minister smiled, but he must not suppose that they were incapable of looking at the question from any but a Party point of view. The Bill had created a remarkably strong feeling throughout the country altogether apart from that section of the community with which he might be considered to be specially identified; and that a measure of such gross injustice should be forced through the House by a method of closure absolutely unparalleled in Parliamentary history would, from the Party point of view, suit the Liberal Party well. But they did not need it. The country was indignant enough with the Government already. It was sick of the Government and needed not this additional stimulus to its indignation. The long dissertation of the Prime Minister upon business was beside the mark. The whole trouble arose from the right hon. Gentleman's mismanagement, from his waste of time early in the session, and his attempt to crowd business into the latter part of the session. The right hon. Gentleman said that the only complaint would be if the Government had proposed a great number of measures. Surely there was another source of complaint. Why did not the right hon. Gentleman use the early weeks and month of the session to get on with the business and not have it now crowded together because of his bungling and mismanagement? Why did not the Government bring in the Bill earlier? Before Parliament met there was every indication that the Bill would be introduced almost immediately after the conclusion of the debate on the King's Speech; but never in the recent history of Parliament had Government Bills been introduced so late. There was a two-fold reason. In the first place, the Prime Minister could not rely on his supporters for the working of the Parliamentary machine. Yes it was; but not because they wanted to discuss measures adequately, but because hon. Members would not attend to their Parliamentary duties; they had to be dragged to the House to vote for the closure. Time was wasted because Members would not return after dinner, wasted by the week that Members might go to Ascot. With his lackadaisical supporters the Prime Minister had mismanaged business, had lowered the character of Parliamentary representation, and now came down to closure debate in a ruthless manner.

Hitherto it had been the custom, of which they had reason to be proud, to accept social legislation because the country was assured it had been freely discussed, and because it had been customary to carry even controversial measures, more or less, by consent. There had always been a definite and deliberate intention on the part of the Government to meet, as far as possible, objection; and the Opposition were always given a fair opportunity of expressing their objections. But on no such ground would the Licensing Bill be accepted. It was a measure full of vital changes; it was not merely a compensation Bill. That was not the main object. The main object was to deprive the justices of discretionary powers they had exercised for something like four centuries. If the inner history of the Bill were known, it would be found that the original scheme was to curtail the power of the justices. Now that was to be done indirectly. It was a vitally important matter touching the interests of the whole nation. The licensing question had wrecked powerful Ministries and baffled the efforts of the most astute statesmen, and to ask the Committee to deal with such a Bill in half-a-dozen days was an outrage upon Parliament. The Government had found the greatest difficulty in drafting their measure. It had been drafted and redrafted a dozen times, and if those gentlemen who had to consider the subject without any special knowledge, and having consulted the representatives of one party to the controversy only, found such difficulty, how, with any show of reason, could the Government attempt to force it down the throat of the House of Commons without any adequate opportunity for discussion. The main points of the Bill had not been discussed. Clauses 2 and 3 would settle the whole basis and method of compensation, and was that so simple a matter that it could be disposed of in a day? They would have to settle the method of ascertaining the value and by whom it was to be ascertained; and what was more important, how the money was to be divided. The proposals of the Bill as to the division of the money were simply outrageous. They were that those who provided the money would not get it, and that those who got the money would not provide it. There were also the important questions of the tenant's title to make deductions and of the borrowing powers under the Bill. All that to be squeezed into a single Parliamentary day! It was ludicrous. In one day also they had to lay down a basis for a new system of granting licences in connection with an entire revolution in the system as to old licences. And for the rest of the clauses and the schedule and the new clauses of the Government and everything else—one day. Clause 6, which was one of the most extraordinary clauses ever proposed in any Bill, would put into the hands of the Home Secretary the power and the duty of framing rules for carrying the Act into effect, so that this was not even legislation by the Cabinet or by the Prime Minister; it was to be legislation by the Home Secretary. Never had there been a Licensing Bill presented to the House before in which the fullest provision was not made for indicating the duties to be done under the Bill and the conditions under which they were to be discharged. But the whole of this Bill was to be put into operation by the Home Secretary, and he did not understand a word of it. Was Parliament to have no voice? Either the Government was not quite clear in its own mind or this was a new system of closure to keep from the House the opportunity of discussing these details. The arrangement of Clause 6 to hand over to a Government Department matters that ought to settled on the floor of the House was preposterous and an outrage on the House of Commons.

Reference had been made to what other Ministers would do if this Resolution were made a precedent, but Liberal Administrations had no protection in another place, and might as well rely on the Carlton Club to pass their measures. They had to depend entirely upon the strength of their own position in this House. They had no protection in another place as hon. Members opposite had. Why was this particular Bill selected for such treatment? Why was everything giving way to the brewers' Bill? Why not go on with the Valuation Bill? Why not go on with the Port of London Bill? It was a great injustice to the traders of London that they should be kept in a state of uncertainty. The only other measure the Prime Minister said he would put through was the Welsh Coercion Bill. No measures for the interests of the people were to be passed; only measures in the interests of a class. The real truth of the matter was that the Prime Minister and the Government of the day were in the hands of a trade. Their Parliamentary life depended on the vote of those in that House who were interested in the trade. These Members could cut the thread which held them from going over the precipice of a general election. In a division the other day, when their majority was only thirty-eight, there were fifty Members voting for the Government who were actually interested in the liquor trade. But for these votes their fate could be decided at any moment on such divisions as had taken place. They were between the devil and the deep sea. They knew the fate that was before them, and dare not face it. Let the Prime Minister act the part of a man. It must be a pitiable position to be in—to be brought to the heel of the liquor trade by a crack of the whip. Ministers were depending on a trade whose motto was "Our trade, our politics," and had, as was avowed by the Home Secretary, brought in this Bill to protect a trade that had no higher political ideal than its own greed, its own selfishness. Yes, and the Prime Minister in his own constituency was more at the mercy of that trade than many. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Cambridge University had referred to the great influence and interest that can have access to a Government. Some reference had been made to Manchester scandals. He would be the last man to suggest that the Prime Minister would knowingly lend himself in any way whatever to anything that he knew to be unworthy; but he might be, he ventured to think he had been, surrounded by influences which had brought about proposals which were unworthy, without his knowledge that they were so. [AN HON. MEMBER: Question.] [HON. MEMBERS: What influences?] This was a question of the influence which was at work in inducing the Government to select this particular measure to be pressed forward by most arbitrary means, and it was the question. He was asked "What influences?" What was it that induced the Prime Minister to knight Sir John Mark of Manchester and to confer a decoration on the chief constable?

MR. CUST (Southwark, Bermondsey): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask if it is in order to make a personal attack on a Cabinet Minister.

*MR. SPEAKER: It is often done and is not necessarily out of order. But the hon. Member is travelling beyond the question before the House. It is a question of relevance.

*MR. WHITTAKER said he had carefully guarded himself in what he had said. It was most undesirable for a Prime Minister to be surrounded by a number of gentlemen who did bring influence to bear upon him and put a matter before him in one way only, so as to lead to results that were disastrous and discreditable to the country. He asked the right hon. Gentleman to consider whether he quite knew where his surroundings were taking him. Up to the present the Government had staved off the rapacious demands of the trade; and now they might be said to be at the mercy of the trade and under the influence of drink. It was a humiliating and degrading position for a Government to be in, and it was disastrous for the country to be at the mercy of a Government so upheld in that House. The Government knew that the country was against them on this Bill. The by-elections, Petitions to that House, the representations of both Houses of Convocation, the feeling of the benches of magistrates of this country, the resolutions of the justices of the city of Manchester, of which the Prime Minister was a most distinguished representative in this House, the representatations of the justices of Liverpool and other great cities showed that the country was against this Bill and the Government had not the political courage to face the country.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON (Armagh, N,) said he had not supported this Bill or voted for it at any of its previous stages because there were certain things in it of which he did not approve; on the other hand, he did not vote against it because there were many things in the Bill of which he did approve. But, speaking from an experience of Parliamentary life of many years, he could say that this was the only Bill that had ever been introduced, which, with all its defects, had a prospect of reducing the number of public-houses. They were engaged at the present moment in a great Parliamentary battle with those with whom they were not in sympathy; a battle in which he had taken part in former times and one in which if he lived, and his constituents had the good sense to still send him to this House, he should continue to take part in the future. It was well known that there were two ways of attacking a Government; first, they might attack the Bill on its principles, but the other and perhaps more effective way was to attempt to choke the Government with Amendments to the Bill. That was what the Opposition were at present trying to effect, because it must be plain that if the Government did not take any steps in the direction which the right hon. Gentleman suggested to-day this Bill would go on till Christmas, and he doubted whether it would be done with then. As that was an impossibility the Government were determined to pass the Resolution now before the House. The right hon. Member for East Fife had made a very eloquent and interesting speech, in the course of which he had laid down a strange principle for future political action. The right hon. Gentleman had said a Government returned with a mandate had practically no right to go beyond that mandate or to deal with any question of domestic legislation.

Mr. ASQUITH: That is what I did not say.

Colonel SAUNDERSON: That, at any rate, was the impression which the right hon. Gentleman's speech had produced upon his mind. In that House when a great lawyer spoke they were never quite certain what he wanted to say, or what effect he hoped to give to his words, but allowing for all the intricacies of the legal mind he (Colonel Saunderson) had arrived at the fact that this Government was elected for one object; to carry through, if possible, to a successful termination the South African War. That was the mandate that the Government had received. If the speech of the right hon. Member for East Fife meant anything at all, it meant that the Government had no right with only that mandate to embark on any kind of domestic legislation such as that they were now considering. He did not believe that the right hon. Gentleman if he became a member of a future Government would be content to rely upon that principle. He, also, was an insignificant Member of the House of Commons, and he had a mandate given to him nineteen years ago, and at every general election since the same mandate had been given to him and he had acted strictly up to it. That mandate was at all hazards and by all the efforts at his disposal to keep a Unionist Government in and a Separatist Government out, and, although he had admitted that this Bill had not found much favour in his eyes, he asked himself on the present occasion whether he would be justified in helping to turn the Government out and allowing their place to be taken by hon. Gentlemen whose policy was diametrically opposed to all the best interests of the British Empire; a Party who had apparently laid down the principle that their own country was always wrong and that the enemies of their country, whether in South Africa or Ireland——

Mr. SPEAKER: Order, order! There are some considerations which may operate on the hon. and gallant Member's mind which are not relevant to the Motion.

Colonel SAUNDERSON said, believing as firmly as he did what he had stated to the House, he had asked himself whether he should be justified, holding these views, in assisting the Party opposite, whether from Ireland or England, to turn out the Government, and he had come to the conclusion, although he did not like the Bill, that even if it were infinitely worse than hon. Gentlemen opposite made it out to be he should still be right in voting for the Government.

Sir HENRY FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.) said the hon. and gallant Gentleman who had just sat down had not dealt with either the Motion of the right hon. Member for East Fife or with the original proposal. He was prepared to give a vote rather against his own principles in order that he might maintain a Unionist Government in power. The hon. and gallant Member had stated his opinion that the liberties, privileges, and rights of the House of Commons were of trivial importance in comparison with the supreme issue of maintaining right hon. Gentlemen opposite in power. He thought that speech and what had transpired during the last three or four hours singularly illustrated the indifference and almost contempt of the House of Commons which was at the bottom of this Motion. The arguments of his right hon. friend the Member for East Fife, of the right hon. Member for East Somerset, and of the hon. Member for Oldham, and the powerful and eloquent speech of the Member for Spen Valley, had not been considered worthy of a reply by Members on the Treasury Bench and their supporters. They seemed to be absolutely indifferent. They could not answer the arguments put forward showing why this Resolution should not be passed—the disgrace involved and the effect on the Bill itself—and they maintained this policy of silence which was but another phase of the registration of those ukases to which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Cambridge University had referred. Let the House recall the position at the close of the speech of the Prime Minister. The great part of that speech was the laying down of what the right hon. Gentleman considered to be a necessary change in the procedure of this House in order that it might be enabled to discharge its duty. Before the right hon, Gentleman proceeded to apply that principle to the present state of affairs and to the Bill before the House he dealt with the general question of the utilisation of the time at the disposal of the House, He (Sir Henry) did not wish to refer to previous years. He was quite ready to admit that the condition of public business at the present time was absolutely unprecedented and intolerable. But who was responsible for that? Not the Opposition. The Leader of the House was responsible for the conduct of business. Who fixed the meeting of Parliament so late as the 3rd of February? Under the present state of affairs the great demands on the Government, the questions that had been raised affecting the whole policy of the country, and with war going on in different parts of the world—the House of Commons should have been summoned earlier.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Earlier than 3rd February?

SIR HENRY FOWLER: Yes. The House met too late, and it had had too long holidays. If this was the most important Bill in the Government's programme then it ought to have been introduced much earlier and got through its crucial stages at an earlier period of the session. But what had occurred? For a month after they met they were engaged in endeavouring to find out what was the Prime Minister's policy, what were the views of His Majesty's Government on the most vital issue that had been raised in this country for a generation. And to this hour they did not know what those views were, and if there was a dissolution immediately they were not in a position, and he did not believe the Government or any person was in a position, to state what were the views the right hon. Gentleman and the Government held on the fiscal question. Of course the Estimates had to be passed before the 31st of March, and he did not complain that this Bill was not brought in until after the 31st of March; but then the Government brought in what was termed an uncontroversial Budget. The right hon. Gentleman was right in bringing in the Budget when he did, but it ought to have been gone on with and got out of the way. The difficulties of Parliamentary business had been aggravated by the various attitudes of the Prime Minister as to the course of business. He interposed the Scotch Education Bill, which was eminently a Bill for a Committee upstairs, and the time of the House was wasted for another week. Then came this Bill. The House went into Committee on 6th June when a whole day was occupied. On 7th June, there was a whole day, on 8th June there was one hour, and then, forsooth, the House went back to the Finance Bill, and it heard nothing more of the Licensing Bill till 27th June. Even the Treasury Bench had then forgotten what had happened, and a good deal of time was spent in trying to remember where we left off. There was a whole day on 27th June, a morning sitting on 28th June, another on 29th June, and in the Evening Sitting an hour and a half, and the total time up to that day spent in Committee was thirty-four hours. It was under these circumstances that the Prime Minister had come down to the House and asked them to close all discussion in this matter and brought forward his Resolution in order—he thanked the right hon. Gentleman for teaching them the phrase—to force this Bill down the throat of the House. Two years ago the right hon. Gentleman recommended the House to guillotine the education debate. But under what circumstances was that done, On that occasion the Bill had been in Committee thirty-eight days, and the right hon. Gentleman said a strange light was thrown upon the Parliamentary situation in which they found themselves by the fact that after being in Committee thirty-eight days they were still a considerable distance from the end of the Bill. But he would recall the right hon. Gentleman's memory to the fact that in that Committee the right hon. Gentleman was in almost constant attendance, that he heard a great many of those Amendments moved and argued on both sides, which had not been his practice in this Bill. Why did not the right hon. Gentleman adopt the same policy here; he quite admitted that there might be some justification for a Motion to bring that debate to a close.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: Which way did you vote?

*Sir HENRY FOWLER said he was perfectly sure that he voted against it, because he wished to throw the Bill out. The Licensing Bill, however, this vital measure on which the Government were standing or falling, had only been discussed in Committee for a period of time which, being added up, amounted to thirty-four hours, and he put it to the Prime Minister whether that was a sufficient time for the consideration of such a Bill. The right hon. Gentleman could not say that there had been obstruction on the Bill. He did not know whether the Prime Minister had ever heard of a well-known saying of Lord Beaconsfield, that "The man who leads the House of Commons must live in the House of Commons." He was not one of those who expected the Prime Minister to be here at every hour of the evening and attending to all the debates; but on the vital Bill of the session, which the Prime Minister regarded as of supreme importance, he respectfully submitted to the right hon. Gentleman that it would have facilitated its passage if he had been present to acquaint himself with the well-reasoned and strong objections to this badly-drawn Bill, a Bill which, if it was to be put into shape to be rendered workmanlike, required amendment in almost every line. He did not blame the Government for the drafting of the Bill—he supposed they were advised about that, though whether by their legal or their non-legal friends he could not say—but it was drawn on a wrong principle. The Bill was brought in to meet an admitted general difficulty that magistrates had with reference to diminishing the number of licences on account of their excessive number; and if it had been confined to that instead of being very cleverly drawn so as to include a large number of matters which would very seriously, if not practically, destroy the disciplinary control of the licensing magistrates, outside the simple question of refusing renewals on the ground of excessive number, it would have proceeded upon a better principle. The Prime Minister could not say that the Bill had been fully discussed. This Bill depended greatly upon its details, and these had not been discussed. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to think it would be a calamity if the House were not permitted to rise on 12th August. It would be an even greater calamity to the House to have its proceedings throttled. He did not know whether the Prime Minister realised the danger, alluded to in the admirable speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Somerset, that this Bill could not be a final settlement. The right hon. Gentleman was now introducing a new principle into legislation. Hitherto, when a Bill had been considered—when both sides had brought forward their objections and these had been considered—such legislation had been accepted as a rule. But if Bills were to be passed without discussion then the Prime Minister could not complain if the majority opposed to those Bills refused to accept the decision taken under such circumstances, and felt themselves at liberty to re-open the whole question. The Prime Minister had not forgotten the Bill of his right hon.

friend the Member for West Monmouth. That Bill was fought tenaciously by a combination of some of the ablest men in that House, yet the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Monmouth never once applied the closure. There was not an Amendment of the law which the acutest mind desired which was not discussed and voted upon in the House. What had been the result? That when the very men who had opposed it, notably the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, the right hon. Member for West Bristol, who was one of the leaders of the Opposition to that Bill, found themselves in power the alteration of hardly a syllable was proposed.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): I myself introduced six Amendments and the Chancellor of the Exchequer one.

*SIR HENRY FOWLER: Ah, we must not only number the Amendments but weigh them. My hon. friend will not deny the general principle that the Death Duties have now been practically accepted. Then there was another Bill of which, perhaps, I may say a word or two. I sat for thirty-five days on the Treasury Bench carrying through the Local Government Bill; at one time there were 1,400 Amendments to that Bill. I believe there were between 400 and 500 divisions, and the closure was only moved once, and that was by an hon. friend of mine without my knowledge. That is a mode of procedure which is not open to the danger of the present proposals. [AN HON. MEMBER: The Government sat into the next year.] Yes, because the Government were in earnest, because they considered their legislation necessary for the good of the country, and thought that of more importance than even the hunting or other seasons.

SIR GEORGE BARTLEY (Islington N.): Perhaps you had a reasonable Opposition.

*SIR HENRY FOWLER: One of my right hon. friends reminds me that one Amendment lasted seven days. I do not say the Opposition was unreasonable. At the close of that prolonged controversy I said that I had no right to complain or to maintain that there had been any obstructive opposition, that it was a measure in which the interest of the House was very strongly aroused. A Bill could have no moral weight when passed under such circumstances as were now proposed.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: What about the Home Rule Bill?

*SIR HENRY FOWLER: The Home Rule Bill was fully discussed in this House.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: During how many days?

*SIR HENRY FOWLER: It was altogether, I believe, eighty-two days in this House, but that Bill was brought in in direct compliance with a mandate of the country taken at the general election. Mr. Gladstone was returned to power by a small majority, it is true, in 1892, but he was returned to pass Home Rule. At all events, it was not sprung upon the country. Mr. Gladstone, when he went to the country, did not ask for the support of Conservatives on some other specific ground, which they considered of great importance, and then consider that a mandate for Home Rule. In 1900 the Government got Liberal votes, and men are sitting on the opposite side of the House by Liberal votes given solely and purposely for one reason—namely, the patriotic support of the Government in a time of war, but now the votes obtained on that issue from Liberals are given to defeat what the electors considered their most cherished political convictions. I will sum up in one sentence of the Prime Minister's. I will add nothing to it nor take anything from it. What the right hon. Gentleman said in reference to a similar Resolution was that "he resisted it because it would be the wreck of the liberties of Parliament——"

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: When was this?

SIR HENRY FOWLER: It was in 1894—"and for all time would impair the efficiency and cloud the honour of this Assembly." It is for that reason I shall vote against the Motion.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) said that this was the fourth occasion on which he had taken part in a debate on a Motion of that nature. The first was in connection with the Crimes Act, the second the Home Rule Bill, and the third the Evicted Tenants Bill. The difference between these cases and the present Motion was enormous. The Prime Minister had said, and said truly, that each case had to be considered on its merits, but he did not tell them what was to be done when a case had no merits. With regard to the Closure Motion on the Crimes Act and the Evicted Tenants Bill, everyone who knew anything about the state of Ireland in those days knew that the social condition was such as to necessitate prompt procedure, while as to the Home Rule Bill that was an Imperial issue which had been discussed at very great length, and was bound to be settled at some time. But the present case showed no resemblance to either of those three. The Prime Minister had not proposed this Motion on the ground that there had been obstruction, but he would not say that there had not been; evidently he had no settled convictions upon that point. He had not yet made up his mind. But he would tell the right hon. Gentleman that there had been cool and deliberate obstruction upon this Bill. What did he mean by that? Of course the Prime Minister was not expected, with his multifarious duties, to attend that House at nine o'clock, and as a matter of fact he had not seen what had been going on under his new Rules. But what had happened when the Bill had been in Committee was that the Government at nine o'clock had been in a minority, dreading the attendance of the Irish Members, and so they had had speeches from the hon. Member for the Brightside Division of Sheffield.

MR. J. F. HOPE (Sheffield, Brightside): Never on this Bill. [OPPOSITION cries of "Yes."]

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Then we have had speeches from the hon. and learned Member for Finsbury, and the hon. Member for Newcastle, who were not artists in the business at all. [Some cries of "Peckham."] He reserved Peckham, because his hon. friend the Member for Peckham was an artist, and did not lend himself to obstruction. What he would point out to the Prime Minister was that there had not been one word that could be construed as obstruction, save and except the deliberate obstruction arranged by the Government to prevent them from being in a minority. It was monstrous that the result of their having to listen to these Parliamentary banalities should be that their Parliamentary liberties were to be docked, curtailed, and restrained, and because hon. Members would not come from their clubs and dinner parties to discuss the business of the nation. He did not care who was the author of the Rules of Procedure, they ought to be abolished forthwith. No obstruction! Then why did not the right hon. Gentleman take this Bill during Ascot week? Let the country understand that the Prime Minister deliberately set this Bill aside during Ascot week in order that his supporters should enjoy their fun. He had another reason to advance agains this Motion. The Bill had only been discussed for thirty-four hours. The Education Bill was discussed for thirty-eight days, the Home Rule Bill eighty-two days, and the Evicted Tenants Bill three days. Compare that with the thirty-four hours devoted to this Bill and let them look also at the nature of the debate. Off-licences were debated several hours and were ruled out of the Bill; the whole scheme of new licences had been altered, and the proposal to give compensation to licences granted after the passing of the Bill had been rejected. Again, hours had been spent over the question of the duty of publicans to supply other than intoxicating drinks, and the Government had had to give way on that. If in thirty-four hours it had been possible to secure such important concessions, how could it be suggested that there had been obstruction? He regretted that the right hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh was not in his place. He had taken up a very extraordinary position. He had said: "I dislike the Bill. I have not voted for it and do not intend to, but I shall support this Motion because there is a chance the Government will go out if it is not passed." The right hon. Gentleman need not be alarmed that the Government would go out. They were not thinking of going out, and would not go out if the Motion were rejected. The right hon. Gentleman disliked the Bill and the Motion. But he had a still greater horror of a Separatist Government. Who, however, were the real Separatists? The Prime Minister said the House must either be reduced to impotence or it must cease to be a deliberative Assembly. Did the right hon. Gentleman think the people of England would allow their Parliament to be reduced to impotence or consent to it ceasing to be a deliberative assembly? The people of England were not to be humbugged in that way. By a statement of that kind the Prime Minister could only mean devolution of the work of the House. They might call Home Rule by any name they liked, but they would find that the thing was the same. Who had asked for this Bill? It had not been demanded by a single public meeting; every one of the Labour Members had voted against it [AN HON. MEMBER: And will do so again]; Bishops and Nonconformist ministers alike were unanimously opposed to it. It had been introduced and was to be forced through because of the dominance of an imperious trade, and his authority for saying that was the language of the deputation which recently waited on the Prime Minister in one of the rooms of that House. They did not ask for compensation, they only asked that the discretion of the magistrates should be stopped, and they said that unless that was done something would happen to the Tory Party at the next general election. That was the origin of the Bill. It was a mere election dodge, and if it was possible to indict a Government as it was possible to indict an individual Member for a corrupt practice there was not a judge in the land that would not unseat the whole Ministry.

MR. CROOKS (Woolwich) said that unfortunately he had already been twice closured since he had become a Member of this House, and if this Motion were carried it was very probable that a Motion he had down, with a view of securing that the compensation should go to the licence-holders rather than to the brewers, would also be closured. Labour Members naturally felt rather keenly about this proposed restriction of their rights of free speech. They had not the House of Lords behind them; no Labour representative had ever yet been made a Peer, and he did not think it was likely such an event would ever occur. It was as the last speaker had said—wherever the people of the country had had an opportunity of doing so they had expressed their disgust with the Bill. He wondered that they had not had Petitions sent in in favour of the Bill yards upon yards long, but with the signatures a foot apart, so as to secure length and weight of paper. Possibly the explanation was that the licence-holders were not so strongly in favour of the Bill, because they realised that the compensation under it would not reach them, but would go to men who already had more than their proper share. He listened to the speech of the Prime Minister that morning with very great attention. One had always been led to believe that the right hon. Gentleman had a genuine desire to meet the wishes of the nation in regard to domestic social legislation. But quite recently a Bill was brought forward at the request of 3,000,000 of organised workers, and the House was good enough to pass its Second Reading by a majority of thirty-eight votes. Now the Government had discovered it had no time to devote to the further stages of the measure. Why were the claims of these workers pushed on one side in favour of the demands of a small body?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! I understand the hon. Member is referring to a non-Government Bill which has passed a Second Reading on a Friday. That is not relevant to this Motion.

MR. CROOKS said he feared he was a somewhat troublesome child, for he had not yet got into the ways of the House. What he was trying to arrive at was what justification there was for obeying the dictates of 110,000 licence-holders while there were so many measures for the wellbeing of the whole community urgently called for. There were thousands of men idle, thousands of children hungry, and thousands of the poor inadequately housed. He would like to see this Licensing Bill improved in the interests of morality and temperance. He was on one occasion rebuked by an hon. Member for saying that it seemed to him that politics in that House was a game, but how could he help saying that when he sat there hour after hour and day after day and saw the time of Parliament wasted as it was, when it might be devoted to carrying measures for the benefit of the poor instead of for the endowment of the rich.

COLONEL KENYON-SLANEY (Shropshire, Newport) said there was not a Member of the House who did not regret the necessity for the step that was now being taken, but it had to be recognised that it was a necessity. He was quite prepared to acknowledge the feeling which such a proposal naturally excited amongst the Opposition, and he thought that on the whole the spokesmen of the Party opposite were to be congratulated on the moderation with which they had stated their case. Possibly one or two Members had somewhat overstepped the mark; for instance, he thought the hon. Member for the Spen Valley Division, when he came to read his speech, would probably regret that it had not contained a little more charity, tolerance, and forbearance. But the main point the House had to consider was whether or not there had been adequate time for the discussion of the matters already dealt with, and whether or not, under the proposal of the Prime Minister, sufficient time would be allowed for the remainder of the Bill. Personally he believed there had been adequate time for the consideration of the main controversial portions of the Bill already dealt with, and that sufficient time was being allowed for the proper discussion of the principal controversial portions that remained. There were one or two points connected with the present position of the Bill which ought to be borne in mind. It was common knowledge that hon. Members on the Opposition side had over and over again avowed in the lobbies that the Government should have no legislation this year, unless they secured it at the point of the bayonet. [OPPOSITION cries of "No."] The statement had been made to him personally.

[Cries of "Name."] That being so, it was impossible for the Government to carry any legislation, unless by the drastic means of compulsion. It was also germane to consider not only what had been done, but what yet remained to be done. Only three lines of Clause 1 of the Bill had been disposed of in Committee; there remained nineteen more lines of Clause 1, and to these lines as many as 270 Amendments stood on the Paper. Surely that must mean to all fair-minded men that it was intended absolutely to strangle the Bill with Amendments. It was a significant fact that of those 270 Amendments only two stood in the name of hon. or right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Opposition Bench. He thought that afforded clear evidence of what the Government had to meet if they attempted to fight on ordinary lines.

SIR HENRY FOWLER pointed out that there were 176 Amendments down in the names of Unionist Members alone.

COLONEL KENYON-SLANEY said that that was on the whole Bill, whereas he was now referring only to the remaining nineteen lines of Clause 1. By the attitude they had adopted the Opposition had made it impossible to carry the Bill, except by some such method as was now proposed. Hon. Members made a mistake when they supposed that the chief function of the House of Commons was that of a deliberative and debating Assembly. The country desired that they should deliberate and debate, but it also desired that they should act, and it was in order to turn the House from a deliberative and debating body into an executive Assembly that the Prime Minister was taking a course which the majority of the House believed to be right and proper, and of which he thought the country at large would approve. He should support the Prime Minister, believing that, in the face of a concerted conspiracy to destroy the Bill, the right hon. Gentleman was acting in the best interests of Parliament and of the country.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton) said he agreed with the hon. Member for South Tyrone that the Government would remain in office so long as they could do so by hook, crook, evasion, or anything else. Their organ in the Press was the Daily Mail. He thought he was justified in calling it their organ, because so proud were they of its defence of everything they did that they had made its proprietor a baronet. The other day there was an article in that paper which declared that, no matter what happened in the House of Commons, the Government must not go out of office; if they did, the country would be ruined, for their places would be taken by the Pro-Lamas of the Opposition. That was precisely as good a reason for the continued existence of the Government as any that had been given in the debate. As to the Bill, all he would say was that a more scandalous, iniquitous, and corrupt measure no bad, wretched Government had ever tried to force on the House of Commons or on any other legislative Assembly in the world. He appealed to hon. Members not to inflict upon the House any more cant. The Bill had been spoken of as a temperance measure. Did hon. Members suppose that vendors of liquor would support the Bill if it were a temperance measure? They were not such fools. They wanted to sell their wares; the more they sold the more profit they made; they would not be anxious for the passage of this Bill if they thought it likely to result in their selling a drop of liquor less than they now disposed of. Lord Rosebery had alluded to the Government as a Government of "hanky-panky." On consulting a technical dictionary he found that "hanky-panky" was taken from a Romany word called hickory-pokee, which meant a substitution by sleight-of-hand of a bundle containing stones or lead for another containing money or valuables. It further appeared that the person who habitually practised hickory-pokee was known in gipsy circles as a "hanky-panky bloke." It was, therefore, strong language that Lord Rosebery had used. But had he spoken after this Resolution proposed by the Prime Minister his language would have been stronger still. His own language would be much stronger only he could not find Parliamentary terms in which to express his opinion of the Prime Minister and his Government. After the experience of the present session he had thought that nothing the right hon. Gentleman did in the way of evading or crushing out discussion would surprise him, but he had to confess he had been mistaken. The Government now had the effrontery to throw the blame on the Opposition for the delay of a Bill which their own supporters had obstructed. Time after time they had put up men to obstruct their own Bill until by bullying or teasing they could get a sufficient number of their supporters back from dinner to give them a majority. Good reasons had been given why there should be a lengthened discussion of the Bill, and he was quite prepared to state what he intended to do under the circumstances. He represented a self-respecting constituency, and that self-respecting constituency would disapprove of their representative discussing and voting in fetters, and while this proposal was before Parliament for forcing upon it a bribing Bill he would not give a single vote in the House.

EDUCATION (TRANSFERRED SCHOOLS) BILL [H.L.].

The LORD BISHOP of ST. ASAPH: My Lords, in moving the Second Reading of this Bill, I venture once again to emphasise the two main principles of the measure. In natural sequence to the principle of the Act of 1902, this Bill proposes to give to the local education authorities created by that Act that fuller and freer power of negotiation which local experience has already shown to be necessary. The solution of the religious difficulty, the main difficulty really in this controversy, is found in claiming for the parent the right to decide the character of the religious instruction imparted to his child. The critics of this Bill have not, I believe, ventured to question the soundness of either of those two principles. But it is when we come to the application of these principles that difficulties arise. Before discussing these, a brief survey of the situation created by the Act of 1902 is necessary for my purpose.

The Act of 1902 has beyond all question weakened the denominational character of the voluntary schools. The managers of those schools are beginning to realise that their powers of management are severely circumscribed, and that those powers, where the local authority is unfriendly, can be legally reduced to almost humiliating dimensions. But while the powers of management have well nigh gone, the financial responsibilities of the foundation managers have been, at any rate in one respect, very seriously increased. How, for example, are the voluntary schools, in districts which now for the first time know the feeling of a school rate, going by voluntary effort to raise the money necessary for large and reasonable requirements in the way of structural improvements? No doubt in the past the dread of a school board rate has occasionally added some names to subscription lists, but that will occur no longer. In large towns the position of the voluntary schools is in peril of being lowered by the establishment of higher standard schools which the local education authorities, invested by the Act with the power of grading schools, will probably consider necessary for educational efficiency.

In Wales there is an added trouble. The Act of 1902 euphemistically describes the voluntary schools as non-provided; and in the Principality that description has been interpreted to mean that the voluntary schools are to be non-provided with the means of maintenance. It is true that the Act of 1902 has left to the voluntary schools a remnant of their old privileges. Unfortunately this remnant now supplies our opponents with their one grievance; I say their one grievance because when complete popular control is once given the rest that is asked for follows. In approaching this delicate question of popular control I do not think that any fair-minded man will question the greatness of the services rendered to popular education in this country by the Church of England in the past. The Church of England did not wait to educate the working man until he was enfranchised. The Church long years ago entered upon this work inspired by the parental duty "educate your children." The State has recently been moved to undertake this task by the political motive, "educate your masters." But, my Lords, great as are the claims of the voluntary schools, I frankly admit that when I find that before 1870 public funds contributed only 37 per cent. of the total cost of maintenance, and that now they will contribute more than 90 per cent., justice demands that control should go to the paymaster.

In the present controversy the representatives of the voluntary schools are, of course, the champions of the cause of religious education, and their opponents the champions of popular control. These claims do not seem to me to be irreconcilable. Even in Wales the local education authorities are not as a body opposed to the giving of religious instruction. This Bill offers an arrangement by which the representatives of the voluntary schools may barter the small remnant of privilege still left them for a plan which will secure religious instruction in all the elementary schools of the country. This Bill would make such an arrangement locally easy and legally binding. It seems to me—if this may be said here without disrespect—that such an arrangement is more easily carried out in detail by negotiations with the local authorities than by an appeal to Parliament, where other considerations would come in to harness and mutilate the progress of any such measure. In any arrangement contemplated there are two points that must, of course, be fully and fairly faced—the question of inside facilities and the abolition of tests. I think it will be generally admitted that the vast majority of the people of this country have made it clear that they consider that religious instruction is an essential part of education, and that they are resolved that the education given in their elementary schools shall not be bereft of this essential. The difficulty is the character of the religious instruction to be imparted. The Board schools met the difficulty in a somewhat negative fashion: "You must take the syllabus we offer or nothing." In passing may I observe that there must be some flaw in the logic of those who desire to free religion from all State patronage and control and at the same time now ask the State to endow and control this school board religion in all the elementary schools of the country. This attempt to formulate a religious instruction so vague and varied that it must be nameless, is not satisfactory.

May we not get clean away from the wrangle about denominational and undenominational, if we substitute for these gaunt and irritating epithets the word "parental"? Will anyone venture to maintain that any body of school managers—Board or voluntary—ought to have the right or the power to decide the faith which is taught to the child? This Bill thus claims what common sense and common justice demand—the right of the parent to have his child taught his own faith in no delusive or proselytising spirit. The recognition of this parental right places us on sound ground. If religious instruction is to form an essential part of education in elementary schools it must be given in their school hours. Your Lordships may have heard of an experiment on a large scale made last year at Eastbourne by the Free Church Council to organise what are called outside facilities. The complete failure of that experiment remains for our instruction. On the other hand the plan of inside facilities existing in the Drury Lane Day Industrial School, which is practically an ordinary Board school, affords evidence that such a system may be successfully worked while people are reasonable and just. No doubt there is, as the noble Earl opposite said, opposition in some quarters to inside facilities; but it is my conviction that the opposition grows weaker as the justice of the demand and the principle upon which it rests are more clearly understood.

Our opponents are not unwilling that the school board religion should be taught at the public expense. We, however, only ask that we may be allowed to teach our own children at our own cost their own faith. I desire before leaving this point to quote a solution of the religious difficulty which was put forth some time ago in the form of an Education Bill. That Bill made these proposals: "All children will be bound to attend the religious instruction. Every denomination will be able to obtain the religious instruction they desire for their children. Such instruction will be imparted by the ministers themselves or by such other persons as may be appointed by them. The Government shall not be called upon to pay for the religious instruction so given." These provisions are taken from an Education Bill drafted by the late Mr. Thomas Gee, a minister and leader of Welsh Nonconformity, a man of unique influence among Nonconformists. Mr. Gee as a politician did not belong to the less advanced section of his Party, and I cannot bring myself to believe that an arrangement which commended itself to Mr. Gee will be repudiated by the political representatives of Nonconformity to-day. It would be premature at this stage to discuss in further detail more than the main principle of this proposal.

I now come to the question of tests. Once more justice seems to me, I frankly admit it, to deprecate the imposition of a religious test for the great majority of those who are now public servants. But I go even further. I am not at all sure that a legal religious test is the best means of securing what we want. The character of the teacher is the important point. I grant that the Bible teacher, to do any good, must be a Bible believer.

How is this to be secured? You must have, it is said, a test. There is a legal test and a real test, and often they are not identical. There may be a legal test laxly applied, and laxly submitted to, and therefore, for the purposes for which it was devised, in no sense a real test. I imagine that the most strenuous defender of legal tests to-day would have to admit abundant illustrations of this statement in the past. On the other hand, you may have a very real test without any legal sanction at all for the same. In Wales, we have had for ten years undenominational intermediate schools, without any religious test whatever for the teachers of the staff.

At the beginning of things, in some of the schools with which I was well acquainted, the governing bodies were overwhelmingly Nonconformist, and, although no test was supposed to be applied and the suggestion of a test would have been indignantly repudiated, I know, on the best authority, that no Churchman, and most certainly no Roman Catholic, would have had the slightest chance of being appointed to the mastership, although his qualifications were unquestionably the highest. It went even further than this. Where the Calvinistic Methodists are predominant other Nonconformists grievously complained that the silent test which all clearly understood, but none acknowledged, was Calvinistic. But I now gladly recognise that this initial tendency to unfairness is disappearing. But this experience shows that you may have very real tests which are not legal, and legal tests which are not real. The fact is that, in the ultimate resort, these matters are ruled by the predominant feeling and conviction of those interested in the school, and that, while theoretically it seems unanswerable that for Christian teaching there should be a legal test that the teacher is a Christian, it will be found in practice that the main safeguard lies in the religious convictions of the community immediately concerned. Even in Wales I could accept that security provided that the power of the local authorities is not restricted by such Parliamentary fetters as the Cowper-Temple Clause.

Experience has made clear that the Nonconformists as a body are in favour of religious instruction. When I see the forces that are gathering for those who value education only on its secular and material side, I feel profoundly anxious that the friends of religious instruction, whether Churchmen or Nonconformists, should not weaken their influence by unnecessary strife and division. Remove the grievances that cause contention, and the united forces of those in favour of religious education may be trusted to secure qualified teachers, because absence of legal tests by no means implies absence of inquiry as to a teacher's faith and fitness to instruct. Looking at this matter as a Churchman, I ask myself whether the cause of religious education, for which the Church has made such splendid sacrifices in the past, will not best be promoted by such an arrangement as would be permitted under the provisions of this Bill.

It seems to me that the best use which can be made of the hold over schools which the Act has left to the Church, may be, before it is lost piecemeal, to exchange it, on adequate security, for an arrangement which would give religious instruction in all our elementary schools. Your Lordships may have read Mr. Augustine Birrell's words on this point—

> "How," he asks, "can a compromise be affected? Do ut des calls our Birmingham Bismarck. It is a wise maxim. What has Nonconformity got to offer the Church of England? But one thing—the Cowper-Temple Clause. What ought or might the Church party be willing to give in exchange for a right of entry into the provided schools?"

Mr. Birrell's answer to his own question indicates his approval of such a mutual concession.

I would venture to say one word to my Nonconformist friends. I am anxious to understand and to sympathise with their grievances; such sympathy is not rendered easier by the grotesque misrepresentations which have prevailed of the Act of 1902. I think it may be said that the Church of England has borne all this misrepresentation with dignity and self-control. There are extremists who hope that a swinging pendulum may give them all they ask for, but I believe they will find that they have miscalculated their own power. Be this as it may, I trust that the cause of education is not to be made once more a subject of political strife and agitation. It is my conviction that the measure now submitted to your Lordships would do something to arrest such a catastrophe. The details of the measure are doubtless open to amendment, but the principles upon which it is based are, I believe, accepted as sound. The local education authorities will have a freer hand given to them in carrying out those educational responsibilities with which they are already charged. It is, I believe, the verdict of the people of this country that there is to be religious education in our elementary schools, and this Bill claims that the faith taught to the child shall be decided by the parent of the child.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2a."—(The Lord Bishop of St. Asaph.)

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL AND PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF EDUCATION (The Marquess of LONDONDERRY): My Lords, I did not rise at once to address your Lordships when the right rev. Prelate resumed his seat, as I anticipated that I should have heard other right rev. Prelates discuss the question, and I certainly had hoped to have heard from noble Lords opposite their views either in approval or condemnation of the Bill. I confess that my position at the present moment is a somewhat difficult one. It might be said that there was no reason whatever why His Majesty's Government should interfere in regard to a measure, which, if my memory serves me rightly, the right rev. Prelate who introduced it declared on the First Reading was one for which he and he alone was responsible; that it would have been possible for your Lordships to decide this question without any intervention whatever from the Government Bench; but there are various reasons which force me, if I may use that expression, to interpose in this discussion.

On the occasion of the First Reading of the Bill I responded for His Majesty's Government, and I then expressed the sympathy that I personally felt with the right rev. Prelate in the course he had taken; but I also said that if a definite answer was to be given by His Majesty's Government as to their attitude upon this measure, we must have sufficient time for the consideration of it, seeing that it is undoubtedly a measure which makes considerable alterations in the Act of 1902, for which the noble Duke the late Lord President of the Council (the Duke of Devonshire) and myself were responsible. As I then explained, we could not at a moment's notice allow alterations to take place in that measure, no matter how satisfactory they might be, and even if they were accepted by the whole community, without giving careful consideration to them ourselves. Naturally the right rev. Prelate, after the remarks I made on that occasion, has a perfect right to expect from me a full reply on behalf of His Majesty's Government to-day. I trust that he will not consider me guilty of any discourtesy, or of breaking any pledge that I made on the occasion of the First Reading, when I say that, for reasons which I shall enumerate, it is impossible for me, on behalf of His Majesty's Government, to give any definite answer to-day as to whether His Majesty's Government approve or disapprove of this measure.

As your Lordships may remember, I welcomed the speech of the right rev. Prelate when he moved the First Reading of the Bill, for the right rev. Prelate had accepted the suggestion I had myself made at Carnarvon. I expressed a hope, when speaking at Carnarvon, that it might be possible for all classes of the community in Wales to meet together and arrive at some solution of the difficult problem in that part of the country, and I added that if an amicable solution was arrived at, His Majesty's Government would regard it as very satisfactory and would, if possible, do all in their power to further it. After the discussion which took place in your Lordships' House on the First Reading of this Bill, I had hoped that this question would be discussed and ventilated, not only in your Lordships' House, but throughout the country, so that before the time came for me to speak on the Second Reading of the Bill, I should have been able to gather what was the feeling in that part of the country at which the Bill is aimed, and to give your Lordships some definite answer as to the position of the Government. But I am obliged to admit that the hopes I expressed at that time were of too sanguine a character.

I do not know that I can call to mind a single speech in or out of Parliament, either giving a general acceptance to the scheme of the right rev. Prelate, or even a welcome, no matter how cold. There may be reasons why this should be the case. On the occasion of the First Reading of this Bill, the noble Earl the Leader of the Opposition in this House (whose absence I am sure we all regret, and the reason for it still more) in the very brief speech which he then delivered, offered opposition of the most hostile character to one of the main provisions of the Bill. It may have been due to that cause; but as to that I offer no opinion. But I do certainly recognise this fact, that the Bill does not at the present moment fulfil the condition which I considered so absolutely essential for its recognition as a measure of conciliation, namely, that it should be accepted by all parties in the nature of what I might call an eirenicon. As the Bill has not been accepted in the spirit in which I had ventured to hope it would have been before it reached its present stage, it is, of course, impossible for His Majesty's Government to give support to the measure. That being the case, I cannot but think that any discussion which may take place in your Lordships' House to-day must be more or less of an academic character. Unless noble Lords opposite have changed their minds, as I sincerely hope they have, since we last discussed this matter, they will, in all probability, offer opposition to the Second Reading, and, as I have said, the only chance of its becoming law would lie in its being accepted in the country, and receiving the universal consent of your Lordships' House.

The main and essential provision of the right rev. Prelate's Bill is to permit what I will call an arrangement, and what in vulgar terms might be called a system of bargaining, between voluntary school managers and the local education authority. But your Lordships know full well that if a proper bargain is to be made between two parties, both must start on fairly, if not absolutely, equal terms. The experience of the last few months has shown that, in certain parts of the country, the voluntary schools would not start on equal terms with the local authorities, inasmuch as they have been, I venture to think, extremely unfairly treated, and undue pressure has been put upon them. That being the case, until Parliament passes what is known as the Defaulting Authorities Bill, which I anticipate will shortly come up from the House of Commons, and which I venture to hope will become law before this session is brought to an end, the voluntary school managers will not be on a par with the local authorities, and will not be able to argue or bargain on equal terms. In these circumstances, if the right rev. Prelate will allow me to say so, I do think that the discussion on the Second Reading of this Bill must be even more academic, inasmuch as we cannot offer any suggestion as to what could or should be done until the Bill to which I have referred becomes the law of the land. Therefore, any remarks which I may make now must have reference to conditions which will arise after the passage of that measure.

In the Bill now before your Lordships there are many points of great difficulty; but to my mind the essential element in this Bill in regard to the question of bargaining between the managers and the local education authorities is that of reciprocity. I want to make very clear what to my mind is the definition of reciprocity. It is obvious that no solution of the difficulty can be considered a fair one which denies to parents the right to have their children given such religious instruction as they desire, merely because the school near which they live has been provided out of the rates. Very few of your Lordships will have failed to observe the remarks made in the other House by Mr. Lloyd-George and Dr. Macnamara, who have given vent to volumes of praise of the Scottish system of education, and who have also gone further, and declared their desire that the Scottish system should be extended to England and Wales. If that desire were carried into effect, the restrictions which at the present moment prevent denominational education in provided schools would entirely disappear. I regret that the noble Earl the Leader of the Opposition is not in his place to-day, because I should have liked to ask him how he reconciles the statements of his followers in the other

House with his own remarks on the First Reading of this Bill, when he denounced any question of denominational education in voluntary schools. Compare the proposals of Dr. Macnamara and Mr. Lloyd-George with the proposal contained in the Bill of the right rev. Prelate. The right. rev. Prelate's Bill only requires that denominational instruction should be given in voluntary or provided schools at the expense of the denomination, whereas under the Scottish system denominational instruction is given in schools where it is demanded, not at the expense of the denomination, but at the expense of the rates as a whole.

LORD TWEEDMOUTH: I am sorry to interrupt the noble Marquess, but I should be glad if he could quote the speech of Mr. Lloyd-George in which he said that he was ready to accept the Scottish system in all its details in Wales.

THE MARQUESS OF LONDONDERRY: I think I can quote that from the speech of Dr. Macnamara.

LORD TWEEDMOUTH: Can the noble Marquess quote it from the speech of Mr. Lloyd-George?

THE MARQUESS OF LONDONDERRY: I have not Mr. Lloyd-George's speech with me, but I have it in my mind. I may say that I quoted his speech in his own constituency, and was not contradicted there; but as I have not the extract I will leave Mr. Lloyd-George out of consideration. I do not think the noble Lord will repudiate the fact that that statement has been made by Dr. Macnamara. What I do say is that if this Bill is denounced by noble Lords opposite, or not considered worthy of consideration in this House because it does offer these proposals, then I say there is altogether taken out of the Bill that spirit of reciprocity which in any bargain must be an essential feature. I now come to a very difficult part of the question. I refer to what are known as the facilities given for denominational instruction in provided schools. I am one of those who consider religious instruction in schools as of such importance that I view with the greatest possible apprehension any proposal to give it up. It is said that a syllabus could be issued which would be agreeable to all parties, but I doubt very much whether that is the case. I go further. It is my conviction that a teacher who has to impart religious instruction should be a person absolutely devoted to it in spirit, and who honestly and earnestly believes in the instruction which he or she imparts. Consequently, I think that that is one of the parts of the Bill which, even if it were accepted by your Lordships, we should have to very carefully consider before allowing it to become law.

I hope the right rev. Prelate will not think that in the remarks I am making I am guilty of undue criticism. I can assure him I fully recognise his good intentions in introducing this measure. I should very much regret that he should for one moment think that I did not appreciate the great efforts he has made to solve this very difficult question, which some people regard as impossible of solution. But it has been my duty to-day to endeavour to balance the difficulties and the advantages that may arise, should the Bill become law. I say at once that this measure cannot be considered a Government measure. It is a measure of which His Majesty's Government as a whole can neither approve nor disapprove. The question is one on which I cannot pledge any individual Member on the Front Bench. I venture, however, on my own behalf, to say that the right rev. Prelate has my sincere sympathy. I recognise in his Bill his good intentions and, knowing Wales as I do, I appreciate the difficulties that are experienced there in the promotion of the efficiency of education. Therefore, if the right rev. Prelate presses the Bill to a division, I shall go into the Lobby with him. But I would ask him not to press your Lordships to a division on this occasion. I do not think any benefit could result from such a step, inasmuch as there are so many important matters of detail, even one of which any division would fail to settle. While I shall follow the right rev. Prelate into the Division Lobby in favour of the Bill if he takes it to a Second Reading, I cannot admit for one moment that any universal or general departure from the Act of 1902 can be accepted by His Majesty's Government without very careful consideration. If it were found possible, while maintaining religious instruction in the voluntary schools as secured by the Act of 1902, to arrive at some agreement agreeable to all sections of the community for promoting the cause of education and restoring good feeling, the Government would not only consider, but they would be anxious to further such a scheme. But until that time arrives it is impossible for the Government to depart from the position laid down in the Act of 1902. I trust that the answer I have given has not disappointed the right rev. Prelate, whose endeavours to promote the efficiency of education in Wales I fully appreciate.

*LORD TWEEDMOUTH: My Lords, I desire in the first instance to say that I find that the noble Marquess was right with regard to what Mr. Lloyd-George said. He did state in the House of Commons that so far as Wales was concerned he would be prepared to accept the Scottish system; but, my Lords, I do not think it is much good talking about the Scottish system being accepted for Wales only, for we know perfectly well that we should not find in England that acceptance which, if Mr. Lloyd-George is right, would be found in Wales. I was not surprised at the reluctance of the noble Marquess to rise after the speech of the right rev. Prelate. Apparently he was waiting for noble Lords from other parts of the House to inform his mind as to what should be said with regard to this Bill. The noble Marquess, in the most frank and open way, announced that the Government once more had no settled convictions on a great subject. I think this makes the fourth subject which we have had recently on which the Government have no settled convictions—there is the question of fiscal reform, there is the question of reform of the War Office, there is the Irish Catholic University question, and now there is the basis of a concordat to settle this much disputed question of religious teaching in voluntary schools. The noble Marquess said that he was forced to the position he had taken up by the Opposition. For a member of a powerful Ministry, such as there is in office now, to say that the Opposition had forced him to a particular course seems to me to be the most curious confession of weakness that was ever made by a Minister.

THE MARQUESS OF LONDONDERRY: I beg the noble Lord's pardon. What I pointed out was that if this Bill was to become the law of the land it must be by common consent, that it could not be carried into law unless your Lordships' House was more or less unanimous on the subject.

*LORD TWEEDMOUTH: I do not see that this Bill is in a different position from any other Bill. The people who are responsible for legislation are the Ministry in office, and when the Ministry in office has a huge majority in the Lower House of Parliament and a still greater majority in this House, surely it is not fair to try to shuffle off the responsibility on to a "miserable remnant of an Opposition," for we are constantly being informed that we are only a miserable remnant. Therefore, I think we have a right to disclaim responsibility put on our shoulders which we certainly have done nothing to deserve. Like the noble Marquess, I am very sorry that my noble friend Lord Spencer, a predecessor of his in the distinguished office he holds, is not here to-night, because he could deal with this subject with far greater knowledge than I can pretend to possess; but I think the position of my noble friend on the last occasion when this Bill was before the House has been somewhat misrepresented. All that my noble friend said was that there were particular points in the Bill which would be met by hostility. That was all he said, and I think we can say the same thing now.

There are points in this Bill which will be met with hostility, but the principle is one to which we take no exception whatever. It is a Bill which may perfectly fairly form the basis of some arrangement in the future. For my own part, and speaking for those who sit beside me, I can tell the noble Marquess that he is mistaken in regard to the position we take up on this Bill. We shall certainly not oppose the Second Reading. It is quite true we do find fault with the details of the measure. In the first place, we think that the Bill is too small, that it is not sufficiently comprehensive; it only professes to deal with one of three important points. The Bill deals only, and then only to a small extent, with the question of denominational religious teaching in the schools throughout the country, but there are other questions which will have to be considered before a final settlement can be arrived at. There are the questions of the teachers' tests and of management in the non-provided schools. I do not wish to raise these questions to-day. All I say is that in our judgment there cannot be a final settlement of the question till those matters are also taken into consideration and are dealt with in no aggressive spirit. I think on all these questions there is plenty of room for argument, plenty of room for compromise, plenty of room for agreement; but there cannot be a final settlement until these questions are dealt with and considered. And I am bound to say that I do not believe their fair consideration is possible so long as the present Parliament exists, and until we have gone to the electors of this country to obtain from them a mandate as to how these weighty matters should be dealt with.

I say, then, that the first criticism I have is that the Bill is not sufficiently comprehensive. Then I think it is vague: there is no element of compulsion in it. My belief is that for an arrangement of this sort to be satisfactory and sufficient it ought to be imposed on all schools alike. It should not be left to a mere question of local option as to whether it should be adopted or not. It is quite true that in Wales, under the circumstances that exist there, it is possible that it may be acceptable to the Church authorities that a permissive arrangement of this sort should be made law, and probably it might, in Wales, be a settlement of the difficulty; but we have also got to consider England, and the question I would like to put in all moderation is, would either of the parties in England be satisfied with an arrangement on the lines in this Bill? Do you think English Nonconformists would not look upon it with some suspicion, and do you think that the majority of Church people in England would be content to accept an arrangement which certainly places them in a position a good deal less favourable than the position they are in under the Act at present? I hope it may be that the majority of them will be willing to come down from the position they have taken up, and regard this question as one which, as the noble Marquess has said, should be kept out of the region of political strife and should be dealt with simply and entirely from the point of view of the children who have to be educated.

I was very glad to welcome in the former debate the speech that was made by the most rev. Primate. He, I think, laid down three conditions, or said there were three principles to which he gave adhesion, and I equally give adhesion to those principles. First, he said that simple religious teaching should prevail throughout our elementary school system. To that I personally would give my fullest adhesion. He said, secondly, that the religious teaching should be given by those who would give it genuinely as well as effectively. Certainly, in the broad sense, I would accept that; but, my Lords, I could not allow that that principle should be so interpreted that the test of being able to give genuine and effective religious teaching is, that the teacher should belong to one particular denomination. I think that the capacity to give such in an elementary school belongs to members of all denominations, and that all denominations should be treated exactly alike in considering the qualifications of individual teachers for religious teaching in our elementary schools. Then the most rev. Primate said that in our elementary educational system, as a whole, place should be found for denominational teaching of some sort. Again I agree, but I agree only on this condition, that no charge for such teaching should be thrown on the rates, but should be borne entirely by the particular denomination which is giving that teaching.

I think the best test of the way this Bill would work would be to try and see what would happen supposing it were made compulsory instead of being permissive as at is at present. If the scheme were universally adopted there would be only one class of school, which would be entirely controlled and managed by the public, it would be free from religious tests, and for its normal religious instruction would offer the present undenominational teaching. At the same time, either as an alternative or a supplement to this, there would be given denominational teaching in school hours, to those children whose parents desire it, but not at the public cost. So far would the Cowper-Temple clause be modified. I do not say that it is necessary to maintain every detail of the Cowper-Temple clause for ever, but it does seem to me that in order to secure the satisfactory working of a Bill such as this, the Bill should be made universal and apply to all schools, and denominational teaching should not be given within school hours. I do think it very difficult to allow denominational teaching to be given within school hours. I myself, curiously enough, have at my very gates a school where the system I advocate has been in operation for a very long time. It is a Board school in the Highlands, in a district where there are a great many Catholics. There is the usual religious teaching at the beginning of the day's work, to which the scholars go or not as they please, and if they do not attend no remark is made, and they are not treated in any derogatory way for not attending, What happens with regard to the Catholic children is that a priest visits the school two or three times a week after school hours and gives the children instruction in the tenets of the Roman Catholic faith. That is taking place in a Presbyterian school in a Presbyterian country, and the system has worked perfectly easily and perfectly well. I believe the same thing would be found to work in other places with regard to other denominations which certainly are not nearly so far apart as Roman Catholics and Presbyterians. I wish to make it perfectly clear that I do not think that denominational education should be given during school hours, that I think the proposals in the Bill should be made general to the schools, and that denominational teaching should be charged on the denominations and not on the rates. I believe myself that, so far as this particular question is concerned, the Bill may perfectly well be made the basis of an agreement. I welcome it, to use the noble Marquess's expression, as an eirenicon—I mean by that a message of peace, and I hope that later it will be possible to expand it into a concordat.

*THE LORD ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY: My Lords, I was one of those who, when this Bill was before your Lordships eight weeks ago, spoke pretty fully as regards the general principles which underlie every endeavour of this sort, and I do not find in anything that has yet been said to-night any reason to modify what I said at that time as to my own view of the proposals of the right rev. Prelate who introduced this Bill. His wide knowledge of the whole subject and the tone which he has throughout adopted, not merely in this House, but in more trying circumstances outside its walls, would lead everybody to give favourable consideration to any suggestion emanating from him; and I for one rejoice to have heard to-night from the Opposition side of the House a more favourable reception given to the Bill, in general terms, at any rate, than that with which it was favoured on the occasion of the First Reading by the noble Earl the Leader of the Opposition, whose absence we now so greatly regret. At the same time I think it is true to say that the discussion to-night does resolve itself into something not far from an academic character, because it is difficult for any one to imagine that a Bill which is to be criticised with the kind of raking comment which this measure has received to-night from my noble friend who has just spoken would have much chance of being carried through both Houses of Parliament in the present condition of affairs.

I should like to say how greatly I welcome the words which have fallen from the noble Lord opposite, Lord Tweedmouth, as to the three conditions which I vainly endeavoured to make the basis of a conference with Nonconformist leaders some months ago. Had I received from those who I then approached a similar acceptance of the large principles without going into their details, the circumstances might have been somewhat different to-day. I venture to think that the noble Lord, probably through lack of intimate personal experience of such schools, experience which it is difficult for any one of your Lordships except those who sit upon these Benches to have had, scarcely realises the vital importance of the difference between religious teaching inside and religious teaching outside school hours. If the noble Lord will pardon a personal reminiscence, I should like to remind him that a good many years ago I had the pleasure of visiting the particular school to which he has referred and which is situated near the gates of the noble Lord's residence in Scotland. I therefore know something of the very peculiar conditions under which it is carried on, and anything less like the condition of things which prevail in the large towns, say, in South London, or Leeds, or Birmingham, than the conditions which prevail in Inverness-shire, it is scarcely possible to imagine. While I do not want to go into a question of this detail, although it is detail of the highest importance, it would, so far as I can at present see, be impossible for us to give way on this particular point. We are anxious to have the religious teaching given within school hours, because thus only can it in our judgment be effectively given to those for whom the need is greatest.

I was particularly thankful to hear the noble Lord say that he does not adhere to the principle, so constantly repeated by those who seem to be leaders on the side he represents, that it is contrary to sound Liberal principles to make any inquiry whatever as to the religious tenets of a person who is to give religious instruction. I understand the noble Lord's contention to be that to inquire as to the denomination of a teacher is one thing and to inquire as to his power to give instruction is another; but I could furnish the noble Lord with quotation after quotation from the accredited and responsible protagonists on the other side, who have used words which are quite incompatable with what the noble Lord has this evening, to my great satisfaction, said. I shall rejoice if the noble Lord's words to-night are the signal of a new departure among those who have, in a way that has disappointed most of us, declined to allow that it was compatible with large and liberal principles in this matter to find out whether or not a teacher who is to give religious instruction is competent to give it from his heart as something which he believes.

I regret, however, to hear the talk about "two sides" in this controversy. It is a controversy largely carried on among those whose special task it is to set forth the doctrines of the Christian faith in England, and it is deplorable to hear "two sides" spoken of in a controversy of this kind, while at the bottom of the hearts of those who are contending there is practical agreement in the desire to see religious teaching maintained in our schools. But, my Lords, we do need to ascertain how far we are at one as to practical policy. For it would be a farce to pretend that a Bill of this kind laying down principles upon which a concordat could proceed would be worth anything unless it be accepted with considerable cordiality by both parties to the controversy. While what we have heard to-night qualifies to some degree the opposition which such proposals have hitherto met with, I shall be agreeably surprised if we learn that so great a change takes place as to enable those who have been opposing us hitherto to join us in carrying forward a measure on the lines of this Bill. However anxious we may be for a peaceful solution, we dare not shut our eyes to the modes of argument which are being everywhere employed, and I must confess that it is very difficult to carry on a controversy of this kind amid misrepresentations, taunts, and denunciations on the part of those who are trying to oppose us in this matter. The utterances do not come merely from the irresponsible Members of the other party to the controversy; they come from the responsible spokesmen of a great Party in the State which has been endeavouring to set forth the principles of what it strangely describes as religious liberty. Here are a few examples of the kind of utterances to which I refer—

> "Nonconformists will never stop their warfare until they have completely disestablished the Church."
> "This Bill takes the Board schools from the people and gives them over, roughly speaking, to one section of the people, the Anglican Church."
> "What is at stake is not education, but the inalienable birthright of the citizen, the right to the free, unfettered use of his inmost soul."

I rejoice to hear this evening from the Opposition side a different tone, and I welcome it from the bottom of my heart.

May I say a word or two upon the larger question which is involved although I doubt whether there would be a very wide difference of opinion among your Lordships upon it. It is, of course, perfectly possible for the Church of England to make over bodily to the nation as a free gift, the whole of the schools which have been with immense sacrifice and at enormous cost erected by the members of the Church of England. Their value is variously estimated, but I imagine that £20,000,000 is a very moderate estimate indeed. But if we were to do this it would have to be because we had obtained absolute assurances that the principles of the cause for which we have incurred this enormous cost of labour and self-sacrifice, mainly on the part of the clergy, to maintain these schools were absolutely assured for the time to come at the very least as firmly as they are assured now. That is the assurance we ought to be able to obtain before we are even asked to withdraw from a position which the fairness and common sense of Englishmen, apart from religious principle, would feel that we have a right to retain, and we are certain we are doing nothing unfair when we claim to have a predominant say as to the character of the religious teaching which is for the future to be given in our schools.

We are constantly asked, "Why not trust the common sense of the people at large?" I have great sympathy with that argument. I believe that if we were allowed to put it freely to the test the underlying principles of religious purpose which characterise the English people would prevail to maintain in the vast majority of cases the kind of teaching we should desire to see given in our elementary schools, but what we are asked to do is not that. We are asked to bid the English people go into the settlement of the controversy with one hand tied. It is suggested that we should say to the public, "You take the schools over, but the teaching in them must be of a particular character." And it is because the thing we are asked to do does not consist in trusting the people freely, but rather in half trusting the people, that I for one feel the most intense difficulty in giving practical effect to principles which in their abstract and general sense we cordially approve.

Then again we are constantly asked, "Why should you not be satisfied with the kind of teaching given in the Board schools? Surely it is good on the whole." That argument is constantly accompanied by a kind of easy reference to the school boards of London, Birmingham, Liverpool, and other places of that sort. But there is the widest possible contrast between the religious teaching given under such auspices as those and the religious teaching given in recent years in the smaller, less responsible, less splendidly-manned kind of Board schools up and down the country. Your Lordships will remember that in 1895 a Parliamentary Return was published, showing what was nominally the religious teaching given in the Board schools of England and Wales.

That Return shows that in 1895 fifty-seven school board districts in England and Wales had absolutely no religious teaching of any kind at all, that 316 others read the Bible with no word of comment (which practically means for little children no instruction at all as to what the Bible means), and there were something like 700 districts in which the religious teaching given was not inspected at all. And that lack of inspection makes the teaching given in many cases practically worthless. The last thing I desire publicly to do is to give specimens in an argument of this kind which might prove to be irritating rather than helpful; but I should be ready, if necessary, to show that religious teaching has been practically non-existent in a large number of places, where the Blue-book says it does exist—non-existent because there was no inspection and nobody whose business it was to see that the instruction was properly given. There, again, comes in the question of Scotland. The Scottish people are a more religious people in the mass than the English, there is more interest taken in theological subjects by the people in Scotland than in England, and for many years the religious teaching given in the board schools in Scotland was excellent, partly owing to the thorough training of the teachers in religious matters, and partly to the popular demand for it and interest in it. Nowadays, however, for lack of inspection, it is beginning, to dwindle and go down. If your Lordships refer to the reports furnished this very year to the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland as to the way in which religious teaching, for lack of inspection by duly appointed religious inspectors, was going down, you will find an object-lesson very full of force and meaning as to what might happen in England if we went forward on similar lines. It is because there is in England a large mass of people who care, with all their heart, for the improvement of their schools in secular matters, but who care yet more for the religious side, and are determined that they shall not only have religious teaching given, but that the value of that teaching shall be inspected, the qualification of the teachers ascertained, and year by year a report rendered to the authorities—it is for that reason that not only in Church schools, but in Board schools, the religious instruction has been so good as it has. There, my Lords, are matters we should bear in mind when we are contemplating a great change in this far-reaching question. The discussion which has taken place to-night is to my mind reassuring, as showing that we are drawing nearer the possibility of arriving at a conclusion which shall maintain in their fulness the fundamental principles for which we care.

*LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY: My Lords, I wish at the outset to say that I do not approach this Bill in any spirit of hostility. Before coming down to the House this afternoon I had made up my mind, after giving the most careful consideration to the Bill, and after reading and re-reading all the speeches delivered on the First Reading, that though I did not think this Bill a possible basis for legislation in this session, there was an opening as to certain concessions of principle which, if accepted, and possibly if debated in Committee, might pave the way to fruitful and effective legislation in the future. And I must say I was a little surprised by what struck me as the change of tone adopted by the noble Marquess the President of the Board of Education.

Speaking at Carnarvon the noble Marquess said that the Government did not assert that the Act of 1902 was perfect, and that they were anxious to secure any solution of this difficult question which should be accepted permanently by all sections of the community. That is a very wise summing-up of what should be the attitude of a Government responsible for the carrying of the Act of 1902, which, as it stands, does not implant in the mind of anyone any confidence either of its permanence or of its satisfactory character. I thought when the noble Marquess laid stress upon the fact that, even when a measure conciliatory in its character was introduced, there was not much hope of dealing with it unless we got substantial agreement on both sides of the House, that the noble Marquess's political instincts were singularly ill-directed. For he told us in the same breath that His Majesty's Government were determined to put forward their Coercion Bill to amend in an important particular the Act of 1902. We are told that the Government would think several times before touching that Act. I ask them to consider seriously before proceeding with the Bill which is now hung up in the House of Commons.

May I touch upon one or two of the observations which fell from the most rev. Primate? I did think that it seemed there was an attempt, both on his part and on the part of the noble Marquess the President of the Board of Education, to run away from responsibility in connection with this Bill, and to attempt to fix the responsibility on this side. There was a special attack made upon the noble Earl who leads the Opposition. I heard the noble Earl's speech, and I thought that it was a most cautious speech, not declaring any general hostility to the Bill, but simply putting in a caveat as to the special points with regard to facilities within school hours. The term "within school hours" is one of a very technical and special character. I heard also the speech of the most rev. Primate. Some people give an indication by their reticence which other people give by outspoken remarks, but though the most rev. Primate followed the right rev. Prelate the Bishop of St. Asaph he abstained from saying any word on the question of inside facilities during school hours.

We are told, and I was very glad to hear the testimony from the right rev. Prelate, that in this question the only people who are to be consulted as to the religious instruction of the children are their parents. That was a proposition laid down at the outset in the debates on the Bill of 1902 by Mr. Balfour, but when an attempt was made to secure that these parents should have effective control by being represented on the management of the schools we heard an entirely different story, and the only people who were allowed to be represented were the clergy and the subscribers—the foundation managers. If you said that in every school district the parents should elect two out of the four foundation managers, that would give a very substantial voice to the parents, but the most rev. Primate told us that what succeeded in the case of the Highlands would not succeed in England, for he told us that the great masses of the working classes in our great towns are singularly indifferent to ecclesiastical denominations. But that rather indicates that all this desire is not a desire so much on behalf of the parents as a desire for the parents, to do good to them, not to give effect to their wishes.

THE LORD ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY: What I was speaking of as the indifference of parents in large towns was not to religious education merely, but to education of all kinds.

*LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY: I cannot contend with the most rev. Primate in his knowledge of schools in general, but I have some knowledge of the attitude of parents in the poorest parts of London as well as in the more well-to-do, and, while I should entirely agree with him as to the great indifference of parents to theological distinctions, I am happy to say that, largely as the result of the devoted labours of the teachers, a very keen sense of the value of the schools has been built up among the parents, and there is a gradually increasing desire on their part to send their children regularly and punctually to school. There were several controversial matters introduced in the speech of the most rev. Primate which I will not touch upon, partly because if I open all the points which might be dealt with my observations would be too long, and partly because I wish to keep strictly to such words as may help to lead to an ultimate settlement of this question. May I say without flattery of the right rev. Prelate, who has moved the Second Reading of the Bill, that I think his speech goes to the root of the matter, and shows an appreciation of the difficulty and seriousness of the problem, and how it ought to be met. I feel perfectly sure that quite apart from the wrangling and disputes of the Churches, there is a body in this country which has not yet been referred to, but which is more important, and in the long run will be more powerful than either Church or Chapel, and that is the body of the citizenship of this country, and it is because I look forward to resting our public school system, as it is in all the great communities of the English-speaking race, upon the broad basis of citizenship, that I welcome the recognition by the mover of this Bill that the ultimate settlement must be the public management of all the schools which are available and intended for the community as a whole.

I quite recognise at the same time that the right rev. Prelate and those who act with him have a right to say that this is not a newly colonised country where the whole thing is being started afresh. This is a country where great vested interests have been built up, partly no doubt by the self-sacrifice of those who believed in distinctive forms of religious teaching, and you cannot expect to step into their inheritance and take possession of these schools in the same way that you would if you were starting fresh schools. Therefore, I maintain that in the case of those schools the present managers have a partial ownership over them, that there is a collateral ownership belonging to the denominations who erected them. The right rev. Prelate in charge of this Bill, and I think I may say the most rev. Primate, though in a more guarded way, recognise that you must have a universal system of publicly managed schools, and they claim at the same time that you must have a recognition of facilities for giving definite religious instruction to those who desire it in accordance with the wishes of the founders of those schools. But they both go a step further than that. They both desire to imprint upon all the schools in the country in the first instance, and at the public expense, a system of undenominational religious teaching. I take it from the speech of the right rev. Prelate that a syllabus such as that of the School Board for London faithfully and efficiently carried out would satisfy him very largely. For many years I have been a party to administering that syllabus, and it is not for me to fall out with right rev. Prelates when they propose to establish that——

THE LORD ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY: If the noble Lord thinks he is quoting me he is going beyond anything I have endeavoured to say.

*LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY: I should be very sorry to misrepresent anyone, but part of the scheme of the right rev. Prelate is that in consideration of making over the aided schools they should make a bargain that in the provided schools generally they may stipulate for a scheme of general religious instruction which would satisfy them apart from the question of facilities for definite religious instruction. The first principle laid down by the most rev. Primate was simple religious teaching to prevail throughout our elementary school system, that is, the establishment of a general undenominational syllabus. The Archbishop of Canterbury shakes his head, but if he will write to The Times and give a sketch of his simple religious syllabus which is to be in force in every school, he will render valuable assistance. I expect it would hardly contain that which when Bishop of Winchester he was a party to introducing into the school board at Farnham, namely, the Apostles' Creed.

That is the interpretation I put upon his words "simple religious instruction to prevail in all the schools." Where I pause is here. There is a strong section of those who are most devoted to Church principles to whom this solution is absolutely abhorrent. It is particularly abhorrent to the National Society, whose official organ it has been my painful duty to read for many years. If that section of the community are modifying their views, and if they are going now to say that the one form of religion which is to have State patronage, and to be picked out as being maintained at the public expense is this general undenominational teaching, I should not oppose them, though, I think, the Anglican has as much right to claim that the minimum of Christianity shall not be taught at his expense as the unsectarian has to claim that the maximum of Christianity shall not be taught at his expense. I believe that the majority of the bench of Bishops would prefer general Bible teaching to none. I believe that most of the clergy, when they are not engaged in abusing school board religion, in order to keep out a school board, would prefer it, and I believe the majority of the people of England prefer it. But there is a great difference between letting responsibility rest with the local education authority as to the amount of religious teaching to be given and in putting it in an Act of Parliament. That would be with a vengeance an affirmation of State religion in our elementary schools.

May I now touch upon the Archbishop's three conditions? He says I have not done justice to his first condition. I shall await a fuller exposition of what it is, although I think I have put the fairest and most natural interpretation upon it. The second condition was that religious teaching must be given by those who can give it genuinely and effectively. I dissent from the Archbishop's analogy of the teaching of drawing. I contend that the teaching of religion does not rest on the same footing as drawing. When you come to teach the foundations of moral conduct, there is no doubt that the convictions and the feelings of the teacher are as vital as his knowledge; but I ask your Lordships does anyone imagine that with the education authority you have you are going in any way to introduce, even if it were desirable, an inquisition into the piety and holiness of the people employed to teach in your elementary schools. We went into all this in the School Board for London, and we saw it was ridiculous. You cannot allow an inquiry into people's religious convictions. We do not allow people to ask, "Are you of any denomination," and that is the usual feeling of the people of this country.

You would not get laymen elected by the community to consent for one minute to an inquisition into the religious belief of the people they employ in the elementary schools, but the more you insist on the fact that the people who teach things which are to appeal to the conscience and the heart should be people in earnest in what they teach the more you are thrown back on severing that part of the teaching from secular teaching and giving it to people who believe in it, and are chosen by the Churches and not by the community. I do not know that even a small religious community are always successful. I see before me the noble Viscount under whom I had the pleasure of serving for a long time on the Education Commission, and he will remember we sent the most searching questions to the managers of schools throughout the country, and we found that the returns showed that a far larger percentage of the managers of schools of the Church of England admitted that they habitually suspended religious instruction when the Government examination was drawing near, than was the case in the Board schools. I do not believe myself that in choosing teachers for the ordinary work you will be able to get people whom the various denominations would entrust with the duty of speaking upon religious matters to the children, and you had better abandon that idea; but if, of course, you are willing to take the responsibility yourself, if the clergyman of the parish is willing—and I am afraid a large percentage of the clergymen are not—to go into the schools, say, at nine o'clock in the morning and take part themselves in the teaching, then you will get a person who is presumably fit to talk seriously and thoughtfully to the children.

The third point was that in our educational system as a whole place should be found for denominational teaching of some sort. I put it to the right rev. Bench. Is not the idea "in school hours" technically a weak staff to lean upon? You may have the instruction given out of official school hours and yet at a most convenient time. The right rev. Prelate who moved the Second Reading of this Bill used the illustration of the Drury Lane School, but he forgot that this school is under a different Act, and that the registration of children according to denominations is compulsory. But if he wants an illustration of what can be done in the way of voluntary religious instruction when people are in earnest, I would recommend him to turn his attention to the schools frequented by the Jews in the East End of London. There is no doubt the Jews are very tenacious of their religious convictions, and anxious that the children should be fully brought up in them. The Jews have organised at their own expense in the East End a voluntary organisation, and the School Board, and now the County Council, have put at their disposal the use of the buildings, with no charge for warming or lighting, but outside school hours. I believe that when there is a keen desire you will have that; but the fact is, there is no use disguising it, that there is not that keen desire; and this desire, whether it is for denominational or undenominational teaching is put forward on behalf of the people, and not by the people.

The noble Marquess said the Bill had his sympathy. I think in these things we want a little more than sympathy. We want support, and I am prepared to support the right rev. Prelate. I do not think he has thought out his Bill sufficiently. It would not be suitable to go into the details of the Bill now. That is a matter for Committee, but I shall be prepared to show that this Bill in no way gives effect to the wishes the right rev. Prelate has expressed in his speech. So far from giving greater facilities to the public authority for the transfer of schools, it rather puts difficulties in the way. It proposes arrangements which, while I have no doubt they will be used in good faith by the right rev. Prelate, might be used in very serious bad faith to throw a burden on the community and afterwards to regain use of the schools. I would not have made that charge unless I had an instance to give which I think illustrates the mischief that might come from these permissive transfers with the power of breaking down the obligations of the Act of Parliament as to rent, purchase, and cost of repairs.

The newspapers of late have been very full of letters of indignation on behalf of the Church of England against what was supposed to be a very mischievous concession made in the Isle of Wight, where certain Church schools were to be given over; but when your Lordships know what were the facts about that school in Cowes, you would think the indignation ought to come rather from the Nonconformists and ratepayers than from the Established Church. I have in my hand the agreement, and it goes on to recite that the freehold of this school is vested in the Bishop, and that whereas the foundation managers of the said school are quite unable to provide or to raise the large sum of money which, according to independent reports of the surveyor for the local education authority and of the Voluntary Schools Association will have to be spent to bring the school premises into proper condition for the purposes of education, and whereas the said managers have made every effort to raise such money but have failed, then it is proposed that the school shall be transferred, that the public authority shall put the schools in repair, that after a certain time the agreement may contemplate the schools being taken back by the voluntary managers, but the public authority are to have no lien on the buildings so put in repair when they are restored to the voluntary managers.

The most rev. Primate spoke of the unfair statements made outside your Lordships' House. Would he think it hard if I were to say outside the House, as I say inside the House, that we must be very careful not to allow the public to be plundered in order that insanitary voluntary schools may be put into repair and then handed back to the owners, because that is what was proposed at Cowes. I wish to remind the right rev. Prelate, before sitting down, of a fact which I am sure the noble Marquess the President of the Board of Education will endorse, that he must not imagine that by putting in his Bill the provision that these schools shall not be affected by the Transfer Clause of the Act of 1902, which makes such a school a new school, he is going to get his school back. I am quite sure many of the right rev. Prelates here know perfectly well that the school and the schoolhouse are two different things. The school is like the church, a congregation of faithful men; the schoolhouse is the building in which that congregation are assembled, and the transfer of the school is the transfer of the organisation with the children and their teaching staff. The mere fact that they are taught for some time in temporary premises does not oust the public authority from the responsible duty and right of continuing the education of these children as an existing school and not as a new school if, from any circumstances, they should be deprived of their premises.

We have constantly in London taken over voluntary schools for a time until a proper school could be provided, but we never recognised that, merely because the building went back to the voluntary owners, the children went back too. The children were ours and we continued to educate them. I would ask right rev. Prelates, Do they not believe that in the rural districts of Wales, where the single school system prevails, there will be always be two-thirds or three-fourths, perhaps nine-tenths, of the parents who are not members of the Established Church? Is it not natural that these people should wish, not for a short time but permanently, that they should have a voice in the management of the schools, and that the positions of headmaster and headmistress should be open to their co-religionists. You must come to that, and I do not hesitate to say that the longer this controversy goes on the more the people of this country will be determined that the public school system shall rest upon a civic and not an ecclesiastical basis.

Lord NORTON: My Lords, this is a subject in which I have all my life taken the keenest interest. Half a century ago I was Vice-President of the Education Committee's Council, and even before that I spent many years in promoting the voluntary system. I have seen how the subject of national education has been necessarily taken up by the State, and the danger to this country in the State undertaking the most intimate matters of individual and domestic concern, the most important of which is that of religious education. I believe that if the State steps in in loco parentis the character of the country will become changed. When Mr. Forster introduced by the Act of 1870 rate-support of education, he was afraid it would produce the religious difficulty, and only hoped it would not become an anti-religious difficulty. Anything that offers an opening for getting rid of this difficulty is of the greatest importance. The Bill now before us shews how the difficulty may be voluntarily got over in one locality, and so indicates a principle which might be followed.

There is a unanimous feeling, strongly expressed by the noble Marquess, the President of the Board of Education, and by two noble Lords who have spoken on the other side of the House, in favour of the principle of this Bill, the object of which is to get religious teaching into all our schools, and not separately taught in denominational schools. As long as there are two separate sets of schools it becomes a matter of contest, and it is a very unequal contest. The process of division which has gone on since the State interfered has tended to eliminate from national education the principal part of it—the religious instruction; and it is now by many avowed that the object of national education is simply to fit the rising generation to compete with foreigners in commercial markets. It is clear, from what fell from the noble Lord who has just sat down, that he would propose purely secular instruction in all the schools in the country, and leave religious instruction to the various denominations. Lord Tweedmouth said he objected to the Bill because it was not universal. The merit of this Bill is that it does not attempt to be at once universal. This is a statement which must be first deat with locally, in the hope that the concordat adopted locally may gradually spread. To propose a universal concordat at once is to propose postponing indefinitely the question. This difficulty will, of course, settle itself, as all questions in this practical country do settle themselves. But how? By the entire sacrifice of the non-provided schools. They are sinking now as a result of the pressure upon them. It will be found absolutely impossible to carry on a system in which one body are called upon to support, out of their own resources, an unequal contest with public funds to which they also have to contribute. The voluntary schools are already beginning to suffer through the loss of support. The consequent partnership in undertaking between the public purse and the private purse is one that cannot long be sustained, and therefore the principle of united action in the right rev. Prelate's Bill is necessary to permanency. I hope the voting on this Bill will be perfectly free. I understood the noble Marquess to say that he would support the Second Reading.

THE MARQUESS OF LONDONDERRY: On personal grounds.

*LORD NORTON: Then, so far as the Government is concerned, it may be considered an open question. I shall certainly support the Second Reading, and urge your Lordships to consider whether the Bill will not offer a scheme for removing the religious difficulty, without losing the main object of national education. All the objections which have been made during this debate are objections which could be very well dealt with by a Select Committee.

*THE LORD BISHOP OF ROCHESTER: My Lords, I do not know that this debate can be said to have been a very lively one. At the same time I cannot help thinking that a disinterested spectator would be able to derive from it some measure of entertainment; for I think it has taken, in some degree, the character of what I might call "a fishing debate." I have observed a certain tendency in all the speakers to see what they could get out of the other side, and to register on the tablets of the memory something for future use. The debate has assumed that character, because the object with which the Bill is moved is to express a sentiment, rather than to clothe that sentiment with any particular form of substance. Of course, you must have a Bill, and when you have a Bill, you must have clauses, and the clauses must have a meaning; but I do think it is true to say that the value of the right rev. Prelate's Bill is to give expression to some kind of readiness on the part of different interests to look fairly at any suggestions of re-arrangement or compromise. The noble Lord opposite, in a genial way, threw in, if I understood him rightly, a little taunt at us for being so soon ready for this after the Act of 1902. I own that I did not feel very much moved by that taunt. I think the Act of 1902 may at least be said to have done this. It has left what I may perhaps call, for short, the denominational factor in religious education in a very different position from that in which it found it. I, for my part, am prepared to face the noble Lord's taunt and to say that we should be ready to look very carefully at any serious proposal to give effect to the various forms of religious conviction which exist in the nation.

I do not think that those who care for the sacred interests of religion can be the least indifferent to a condition of things in which religious men find themselves in vehement opposition. I hope I am not saying too much if I say that we should feel this even more, had the controversy on the other side been conducted in the country with more respect for the religious convictions which we hold, if the weapons used against us had been less the weapons of virulence and abuse, and if the movement had not taken so strongly political a character. I feel sure there are multitudes of those whom the Bishop represents, who are in that attitude towards compromise, and therefore I suppose our way of expressing that sentiment is to join the right rev. Primate in supporting the Second Reading of this Bill. But I think we must be a little careful as to what we do not do as well as to what we do. I think that we must not attribute too much to incidental expressions on either side, and still less to the use made by the opposite side in either case of those expressions. It would, for example, be rather startling if the people of this country, on reading the newspapers to-morrow morning, should imagine the most rev. Primate at this time of day committed, as it would learn from the noble Lord opposite, to a universal system of undenominational education. It would, perhaps, be a little surprising, on the other hand, to the noble Lord himself, if it were found that a very kindly, and, in my opinion, very thoughtful expression, which he used about the logic of the religious situation, bound him for all time to the support of denominational instruction by the State on exactly the same terms as the support of undenominational instruction. That is, by the way, what this Bill does not do.

It is unfortunate that the noble Earl the Leader of the Opposition, did on the occasion of the First Reading plump down his foot, if I may say so, upon an objection to the Bill without looking more generally to see what elements of a possible solution it contained; but it is very satisfactory that the discussion to-night has gone the other way. The real reason why the debate takes this form is, if I am not mistaken, that when you have a great question like this in the position in which this question now stands, you can only attempt compromise when the pressure of circumstances drives you that way. It is notorious that in the present state of business the Bill cannot be made law this session, neither do circumstances at this moment suggest the possibility of any general compromise throughout the country. The most rev. Primate has reminded your Lordships that in the course of last year he did, rather boldly, come forward to suggest that it was not hopeless for us to consider, charitably and unitedly, with those to whom we were in a great measure opposed, the terms of some concordat. I think that in trying to get down to the root principles of the matter and below the current controversies he took the risk of the very criticism which the noble Lord has made. He made what was a very honourable offer, but was the result such as to lead us to think that the moment was ripe for a compromise? I have every possible respect for the services which have been rendered by the noble Lord opposite to London education, but I have always thought he appeared to insist on the unbending system of universal undenominationalism which is the greatest bar to a solution of this question. I hope the time will come when the noble Lord and those he represents will be willing to go into the discussion on more hopeful lines. The Second Reading of this Bill in the meantime can do no more than affirm the general desire that the ultimate solution, whether it be next year or a few years later, shall be a solution arising not from the victory of one party or the other but from something which will do justice to the feeling of the different contending parties.

Lord RIBBLESDALE: My Lords, I only intervene in this debate for a few moments. I am afraid the concluding words of the right rev. Prelate whom we always hear with such interest recommend us to a council of perfection which we are very unlikely to see acted upon in this country. But as I understand, he construes the attitude of your Lordships' House to-night as one in cordial agreement with the sentiment which is incarnated in this Bill, but speaking generally he thinks that a Resolution of the House would have been as effective as this Bill. Enough has been said, and very well said, on the merits and demerits of this Bill. The only thing I wish to say is that it seems to me, after the approval given to the Bill by the noble Marquess the Minister for Education, that the Bill should have been introduced by His Majesty's Government and not have been left to a private Member. I daresay it is due to some deficiency in my own intelligence, but I find myself in some confusion of mind about the exact position of His Majesty's Government on this Bill, and, as I daresay some other noble Lord on the Front Bench opposite will wind up this debate, I hope he will make that position clear. It is the noble Marquess who produces this confusion of mind. He began by telling us that nothing was to be done in this direction without the unanimous consent of your Lordships' House. I may say that a good many things have been done in this House, with, no doubt, unanimous and cordial acceptance on the part of noble Lords opposite, but which have met with very little support on this side.

THE MARQUESS OF LONDONDERRY: I am sorry to interrupt the noble Lord. I anticipated that we should have heard from the Front Bench opposite views in accord with those which the noble Earl, the Leader of the Opposition, expressed on the First Reading, and consequently, after that statement in which the noble Earl declared his hostility to the measure, it was with great surprise that I heard noble Lords opposite state that they accepted it.

*LORD RIBBLESDALE: I am afraid I cannot enter into the noble Marquess' difficulties, but he cannot have been quite unprepared, for I understand that a whip was sent out to bring noble Lords down to this debate. But, be that as it may, I pass to the confusion of mind in which I find myself as to the opinion of the Government. The noble Marquess first told us that your Lordships' House should not be urged to divide on this Bill. Then he told us that His Majesty's Government could give no definite answer as to what was their view of the Bill, and he next stated that he himself would follow the right rev. Prelate into the Lobby in support of the Second Reading should the Bill go to a division. This exhibits an agreeable detachment of mind on grave questions to which His Majesty's Government have of late made us tolerably accustomed. But what I want to know is, in what capacity did the noble Marquess address us, and in what capacity will he vote? He told us just now that he was going to vote as a private Member, and an admirer of the right rev. Prelate and of his work in Wales. But the noble Marquess is Minister of Education, and as such we know he has the interests and the morals of education deeply at heart. Is his vote tempered at all by his views as Minister of Education? Does he divorce himself from his position as Minister of Education.

THE MARQUESS OF LONDONDERRY: I think I clearly pointed out that this Bill is a private Bill introduced entirely on the responsibility of the right rev. Prelate, on which I was not speaking as a member of His Majesty's Government and on which no member of the Government need have spoken. I have explained why on personal grounds the right rev. Prelate having introduced this Bill rather in accordance with a suggestion I made at Carnarvon, I shall go into the lobby in support of the Second Reading.

*LORD RIBBLESDALE: That is what I complain of. It is a private Bill and we think it ought to have been a public Bill, as the noble Marquess made such a strong point of its being a desirable Bill. However, I understand that the noble Marquess is speaking as a private Member and not as a member of a Ministry of many talents, but with no settled convictions. But we on this side really mean business. We think this is a desirable locus standi for arriving at a solution. It seems to me there is, then, the unanimous acceptance all round the noble Marquess insists upon. Everybody agrees that the Bill offers a sort of jumping-off place for the closing of long-standing wrangles and disputes, which, to use the words of the right rev. Prelate who introduced the Bill, are "gaunt and irritating" to a great many people, and which, in my opinion, would justify some later day Tertullian to say with all Tertullian's irony, "See how these Christians love one another." If we go to a division I shall cordially support the Second Reading.

*THE LORD BISHOP OF HEREFORD: My Lords, I feel somewhat shy of prolonging this interesting discussion, partly because it is so purely academic. At the same time I desire to add one or two words to what has been said. While I desire to express my sympathy with the right rev. Prelate who has introduced this Bill, I see no chance of its establishing educational peace. Any one who reads the Bill carefully must feel that there is no sort of finality about it; it is purely a piece of patchwork, which could produce no lasting results. As it stands it would be simply attempting a new patch to an old garment. There is another reason why I feel we are somewhat wasting our time in these discussions, and it is this. To my mind it is clear that this is no longer a question for a moribund Parliament to deal with. If it is to be dealt with in any binding and lasting way it must be dealt with by the people at a general election and by a new Parliament. Moreover, as an optional Bill this measure would in many places create more confusion than it would settle. I can understand those who are closely identified with Wales feeling that they would be glad to see a settlement of some kind. The mass of the Welsh people would work it according to Welsh ideas, but over the border they may have entirely different ideas. Therefore I have no hesitation in saying that the Bill would produce endless confusion throughout the length and breadth of the land; and for this reason, that it is optional. As my right rev. brother of Rochester has said, we have listened to a number of fishing speeches. They rather presented themselves to my mind as poaching speeches—speeches in which the speaker was aiming at catching as much as he could on the opposite side of the House. I think this Bill would be worthy of serious and practical consideration subject to the condition precedent that there should be a school under public control and management within a reasonable distance of every parent. Given that condition I believe I could make a reasonable concordat on the basis of this Bill.

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (The Earl of SELBORNE): My Lords, I cannot help thinking that notwithstanding the Party chaff of my noble friend opposite what has passed to-night will be looked back upon as notable in the history of this controversy. Without any offence or intention of offence to my noble friends opposite I will say that this is the first time they seem to me to have officially spoken with any kindly or unprejudiced appreciation of the point of view of those with whom they do not agree on this question. The attitude of my noble friend opposite really does differ fundamentally from the attitude of the speakers belonging to his Party who have spoken on this question in the country, and also from the tone of the official literature issued by his Party; and it is more remarkable because the noble Lord, Lord Stanley of Alderley, although taking a distinctly different view in some respects from that of my noble friend, frankly accepted this Bill as a basis from which he was willing to work. My noble friend who spoke last on the other side of the House spoke even more strongly in that direction. But I think all these speakers have been unfair in their interpretation of the attitude of my noble friend the President of the Board of Education.

The noble Marquess has reminded your Lordships that this is a private Bill, for which neither the Party opposite nor His Majesty's Government are responsible; and he has a right to feel very considerable satisfaction that the Bill has been the subject of debate here to-night, because, however far it may depart from his own particular ideas in this matter or however near it may approach them, it is the first public attempt in either House of Parliament to take up the lead which he gave at Carnarvon, and, much as it may surprise my noble friend opposite who spoke last, the noble Marquess speaks for all his colleagues. But it does not follow that because a private Bill has received the measure of welcome which my noble friend has accorded to this Bill, the Government should forthwith take it up and pass it through Parliament in this session.

Lord RIBBLESDALE: I do not want to interrupt the noble Earl, but what surprises me is that if the noble Marquess speaks on behalf of his colleagues, why should he not say so?

*The Earl of SELBORNE: I think I have answered my noble friend's Question. This being a private Bill my noble friend behind me took up an attitude which is common in dealing with such matters in both Houses of Parliament. In the present state of public business no Bill, however perfect, has any chance of passing into law in the other House this session. I would like briefly to allude to some points of criticism taken by my noble friend Lord Tweedmouth. I think he admitted that it was a correct quotation from Mr. Lloyd-George that he had accepted the principle of the Scottish system so far as Wales was concerned, but my noble friend added that the case of England is not the same. Later on in his speech he gave us a very interesting illustration of a Scottish school at his park gates, and the most rev. Primate pointed out how utterly different the conditions of that school were from many schools in London. Does not my noble friend opposite see the application of his own criticism and the most rev. Primate's illustration to his complaint that there was no element of compulsion in this Bill? If the case of England is different from that of Wales, if the case of London is different from that of Inverness-shire ought not the main point of policy in any settlement to be not the rigidity demanded by him but flexibility and elasticity.

Is it quite certain that what we want is the smallest measure of devolution to local bodies and the greatest measure of compulsion? May it not be more probable that a solution will be found in the greatest amount of discretion to the local authorities combined with the least possible amount of compulsion? When the Education Act of 1902 was introduced by the Government in the House of Commons, that Bill itself was made compulsory. It was made compulsory in Committee, and I think the whole of the Opposition, the friends of my noble friend opposite, voted against making it compulsory. That shows that the opinions on that side are still in an unsettled condition. My noble friend said the Bill was not sufficiently comprehensive. He quoted especially the fact that there was no provision for popular management of non-provided schools—I will allude to that question later on—and said that the question of tests for teachers was not sufficiently clearly dealt with. There is no time to-night to attempt to deal at any length with that most difficult question; but I think if I interpreted my noble friend's attitude correctly it was this, that he and his friends could not agree to, or countenance, any attempt to press a religious test on a candidate for teachership.

Lord TWEEDMOUTH: Denominational test.

*The Earl of SELBORNE: Any denominational test on a candidate for teachership. But, with that proviso, he quite felt the force of the argument that a teacher should not be required to teach what he or she could not teach conscientiously, and that the teachers themselves should be invited freely to co-operate in doing what they could to make a settlement easier; that is to say, that where they were willing to assist, the distribution of the teachers should be such as to utilise their assistance to the greatest possible extent. I think I might illustrate what I understand to be my noble friend's meaning by saying that he would not think it reasonable that a Presbyterian should be deliberately chosen to teach Roman Catholic children.

Lord TWEEDMOUTH: I specially excluded any denominational test.

*The Earl of SELBORNE: I am not saying anything about tests. Suppose a Presbyterian and a Roman Catholic teacher were equally ready to take part in religious instruction, common sense would say that the Roman Catholic teacher should be set to teach Roman Catholic children. I would ask your Lordships to observe how this principle was carried out by Lord Stanley of Alderley when he was Vice-Chairman of the School Board for London. He successfully solved the problem, for in the Jewish schools to which he alluded to-night I understand the whole of the teachers appointed by the School Board for London were Jews.

*LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY: You are misinformed. Not a great many years ago a Jewish head teacher was appointed to overcome the prejudices of the Jews. After that Jews were appointed as far as they could be got, because of the language, but of late years it has been a matter of perfect indifference.

*THE EARL OF SELBORNE: Then my noble friend dealt briefly with the principle laid down by the Archbishop of Canterbury in his speech in the last debate. I understood him to say that he did not differ from the right rev. Prelate in the hope that a simple system of religious teaching should universally prevail in any national settlement. He also agreed that the religious teaching should be given genuinely as well as effectively. He also agreed that a place for denominational teaching should be found, provided that the denominational teaching was at the expense of the denomination and not in school hours; and he wound up by saying he was not prepared to contend that there never could be any alteration of any sort in the Cooper-Temple clause. I do think that that is a very notable speech coming from my noble friend, although I admit that in the proviso he has made in respect to the school hours he is at once touching on a difficulty that goes deep down into this controversy.

The noble Lord and his friends say that this denominational religious teaching, given at the expense of the Church or denomination, should not be given in school hours. I think the onus of proof rests on those who say that a vast body of people in this country, whose children go to the schools and who pay the taxes or rates by which the schools are supported, should not be allowed to arrange with the local authority that their children should have this teaching in school hours if they wish it. The onus of proof will certainly rest on those who desire to fetter, in what seems to me this strange way, the right of the parent, the ratepayer, the taxpayer, and the local education authority. This question, I agree, is not likely to be settled in this Parliament, but as to-day we are exchanging mutual confidences, and as my noble friend who spoke last urged that on this side we should show that we reciprocated the spirit shown on that side, let me put, not in any spirit of contention, some of our points of view, which I think noble Lords opposite would do well to think over.

We have heard a great deal about the Nonconformist conscience. Noble Lords on that side of the House and their supporters in the country say that the Government have not sufficiently considered the conscience of Nonconformists and those who object to a system of denominational teaching. That has not been our intention, but noble Lords opposite do not seem to be aware that Church people have as deep and conscientious convictions in favour of denominational teaching as some Nonconformists have in favour of undenominational teaching, and it will be impossible to produce that national educational concordat which is desired, unless Church people and Roman Catholics and others who are denominationalists are given the same credit for religious strength of conviction as is properly claimed for Nonconformists. You cannot have a national settlement if you leave out half the nation. I will not attempt to dispute on statistics, but I will divide roughly the whole population into two halves—the half to whom the undenominational school is the ideal and the half to whom the denominational school is the ideal. It is quite impossible for us to attempt a settlement, and leave out of count that half who are undenominationalists, and it is at least as impossible for noble Lords opposite to attempt a settlement if they leave out of count that half of the nation which fervently believes in denominational religious instruction.

However imperfect the present system, the endeavour of the Government in their legislation has been to find room for both systems. Noble Lords may contend that the Government failed, that we did not sufficiently take into account the views of our Nonconformist fellow-subjects; but will they right that wrong, if wrong it be, by taking away from the other half of the population the right to denominational teaching? No, my Lords, the only national system, the only peace, the only concordat would be one which was accepted by Churchmen, by Roman Catholics, and by all lovers of definite religious teaching, as well as by that great Nonconformist body who prefer in the public elementary schools to have only undenominational teaching. Hitherto these bodies, although having a different interpretation of their religious ideal, have been united in wishing the system of public education in this country to be associated with religion. Pity it is that they should, by their divisions, misunderstandings, and mutual attacks, give so much hope and encouragement to those who do not wish religion to be included in the public educational system of this country. The real danger that confronts us is indifferentism to all religious teaching. It is because I hope, from what has taken place to-day, that the two sides are beginning to understand each other better, and will so be enabled to present a more united front to those who desire a system of secular instruction—it is because I believe we have advanced a little in that direction that I join in supporting the Second Reading of this Bill.

On Question, Bill read 2^a, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House.

House adjourned at twenty-five minutes past Seven o'clock, till To-morrow, half-past Ten o'clock.

Postal Facilities in County Kerry.

MR. MURPHY (Kerry, E.): To ask the Postmaster-General whether he will arrange for daily delivery of letters in the townlands of Readrinagh, Knockdoorah, Meentogues, Stagmount, Gortnaglah, and Connearagh, between Headfort and Rathmore, county Kerry, seeing that the district is thickly populated and includes two schools.

(Answered by Lord Stanley.) Inquiry is being made on the subject. When it is completed I will acquaint the hon. Member with the result.

Carriage of Parcels from Tynan (County Armagh) to Glasgow.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that the Great Northern Railway Company (Ireland) decline to forward parcels leaving Tynan, county Armagh, at 6.18 p.m., to Glasgow by the Ardrossan boat leaving Belfast at 9.30, unless advised by telegram of their despatch and the payment of one shilling extra; and if he can take any steps to protect the traders of the county from this charge.

(Answered by Mr. Gerald Balfour.) The Board of Trade have communicated with the Great Northern Railway of Ireland on the subject of the Question, and I have directed that a copy of the reply received from the company shall be forwarded to the hon. Member.

Steamer "Allanton" confiscated by Russians at Vladivostock.

COLONEL DENNY (Kilmarnock Burghs): To ask the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he proposes to take any action in the case of the steamer "Allanton," confiscated by Russian authorities at Vladivostock.

(Answered by Earl Percy.) His Majesty's Government are in communication on the subject with His Majesty's Ambassador at St. Petersburg, who has asked to be supplied with an official statement of the grounds of condemnation. They understand that the owner of the vessel has taken steps to lodge an appeal, for which a month's time is allowed, to the Supreme Prize Court, which will sit at St. Petersburg, and in these circumstances His Majesty's Government must await the decision of that tribunal before deciding what, if any, representation they can properly address to the Russian Government when the full facts of the case are before them.

Observance of Sunday in the Royal Navy.

SIR MARK STEWART (Kirkcudbrightshire): To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether orders were given to the Mediterranean Fleet, or part of it, to proceed to sea on Sunday the 5th June, to carry out a torpedo attack that day; and, if so, whether the Lords of the Admiralty will give directions to all Admirals in Command for the due observance of the King's Regulations, that a ship's company is not to be employed on Sundays in any work or duty other than that which the public service may absolutely require.

(Answered by Mr. Pretyman.) Certain vessels of the Mediterranean Fleet, acting under the orders of the Rear Admiral Commanding the Mediterranean Cruisers, left Gibraltar at 6 p.m. on Sunday 5th June, with a view to carrying out certain strategical exercises during the night, and the morning of 6th June. It is not known whether any special reason existed for this date having been selected, but attention will be called to the desirability of a close adherence to the provisions of Article 667 of the King's Regulations and Admiralty Instructions, whenever the conditions of the service admit of it.

Refusal to Sanction Loan for Purchase of Land for Allotments at Gosberton.

SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derbyshire, Ilkeston): To ask the President of the Local Government Board, whether he will state the grounds upon which the Local Government Board have refused their sanction to the parish council of Gosberton obtaining a loan to defray the cost of buying lands for allotments.

(Answered by Mr. Walter Long.) Parish councils are not empowered to purchase land for allotments, although they can hire it. I had, therefore, no alternative but to decline to sanction the loan desired by the Gosberton Parish Council, but I suggested that the matter might be brought before the rural district council, by whom land can be purchased for allotment purposes.

Accidents with Covered Vans—Infringement of new By-law.

SIR THOMAS DEWAR (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will state how the number of accidents with covered vans for the month of May last compares with the corresponding month last year; and will he say how many summonses have been taken out by the police for infringement of the London County Council new by-law.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Akers-Douglas.) The number of accidents with covered vans known to the police to have occurred within the Metropolitan police district during the month of May last was 101, of which three had fatal results. In the previous May the number was 118, one being fatal. The London County Council are proposing to amend the by-law relating to covered vans, and have submitted a new draft which I have approved provisionally. In the meantime, the police, though warning owners and drivers in cases where the by-law is not being complied with, are not seeking to enforce it by means of legal proceedings.

Value of Licensed Premises.

SIR EDWARD SASSOON (Hythe): To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average annual value of the 1869 beer licensed houses; also, whether he will state the number of fully on-licensed houses other than the 1869 beerhouses whose average annual value is below £50.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Akers-Douglas.) I have no means of distinguishing the "ante-'69" beerhouses from other beerhouses, and am unable, therefore, to give the average annual value of the former. The number of fully on-licensed houses of an annual value of less than £50 appears, from Papers which I have laid before Parliament in connection with the Bill, to be 34,535.

Assessment of Income-Tax on Contributions to the British Cotton Growing Association.

MR. EMMOTT (Oldham): To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether his attention has been called to the fact that income-tax is charged on contributions made by firms in the cotton trade to the British Cotton Growing Association; whether, seeing that such contributions are wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of such trade, he will give instructions that such contributions shall not in future be assessed for income-tax.

(Answered by Mr. Austen Chamberlain.) I find on inquiry that the Board of Inland Revenue have no knowledge of the assessments referred to in the Question. If such assessments have been made, their legality could only be definitely decided by an appeal to the High Court from the district Commissioners of Taxes; but it may be convenient that I should point out that, in the analogous case of contributions by a colliery company to a coalowners' association, the Courts have held that the subscription is not money laid out for the purposes of trade, and is not therefore admissible as a deduction from the profits of the company for purposes of assessment to income-tax (vide Rhymney Iron Company, Limited, v. Fowler, 2 Q. B. 79 (1896). I have, in any case, no authority to give such instructions as the hon. Member suggests, and no power to enforce them.

Epidemic at Ballynaclosha—National School Teacher's Salary.

MR. THOMAS O'DONNELL (Kerry, W.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the special circumstances of Mr. Lavelle, Ballynaclosha National School, Armagh; and whether, seeing that his salary for the years 1898 and 1899 was, owing to epidemic, far below what it was before, special consideration will be given to his case by substituting other years for those in which the epidemic occurred.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) The average income for the three years ended 31st March, 1900, was taken as the basis in fixing the consolidated salaries of all teachers, and the substitution in the calculation of any year previous to 1898 was not permissible. Cases, however, in which the rule as to the average income for the three years ended 31st March, 1900, was found to work inequitably, received special consideration. Mr. Lavelle's case was most carefully investigated in connection with a special report from the senior inspector of the circuit, but the circumstances did not warrant a departure from the general rules applicable to all teachers.

Sales on the King Harman (Kenagh) Estate.

MR. J. P. FARRELL (Longford, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland how many of the sales of houses on the King Harman (Kenagh) Estate in the village of Kenagh have been sanctioned by the Estates Commisioners; whether any effort is being made to see that these bargains are not of such a character as will be of little use to the tenants for reduction purposes in the future; and will an nspection be made in these cases.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) No advances have yet been sanctioned. Applications for advances in respect of village plots have been received. These plots have been inspected, and any advances that may be made will be of such amounts as in the opinion of the Commissioners are adequately secured.

Peat Factory Experiments in Ireland.

MR. J. P. FARRELL: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will state what success has attended the effort to establish a peat factory at Inny Junction, county Westmeath; and will the experiment be extended to other centres.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) The peat experiments at Inny Junction have not been in progress for a sufficient length of time to enable the Department to state whether they are likely to prove a success. It would be premature to consider the question of the extension of the experiment to other parts of Ireland until adequate information is available in regard to the result of the experiment now in progress.

Gas from Peat.

MR. J. P. FARRELL: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state if the attention of the Department of Agriculture and Technical Instruction in Ireland has been called to the success of the experiments of peat produced gas at Dumfries and also at Northampton; and whether, as there are large quantities of unproductive bog in Ireland in which this fuel could be obtained, the attention of the Department will be directed to the matter.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) An officer of the Department visited the peat works at Dumfries last year, but did not learn that the production of gas had been a success. The Department has no knowledge of the result of the experiment at Northampton, but will make inquiries on the subject.

Condition of Fishing Industry on the South East Coast of Ireland.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE (Wexford, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he is in a position to state the result of his inquiries into the condition of the fishing industry on the south east coast of Ireland, and what he proposes to do for the assistance of that industry.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) If the hon. Baronet will repeat the Question on Monday next I hope to be then in a position to make a statement in the matter.

Salaries of Irish School Teachers.

MR. MACVEAGH (Down, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the principal teacher of a boys' school in county Down, Circuit 9, Section C, District 19, Roll No. 1950, is trained and in the first division of second class; that he has been granted his training diploma; that the average for the last quarter was sixty; that he has been three years in the service of the National Board; that he got the reports fair, fair, and good; that increments have been awarded on similar reports; that under the old system with his present average of fifty-five he would have a salary (exclusive of capitation) of £82 16s., consisting of class salary £52 16s., and results fees £30; and that his present salary is £56; and, if so, whether, in view of the fact that he entered a training college before the introduction of the new system, the Commissioners will increase his present salary to what it would have been under the old system.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) The principal teacher of the school in question entered the service of the Board for the first time on 23rd July, 1900, and accordingly came under the rules then in force. He has no claim for special consideration under the rules in force prior to that date. Under Rule 194 (c) he ranks as in third grade only. He is paid salary according to the scale laid down for that grade, viz., £56 per annum. The teacher was trained during the session 1898–1900, but the privileges embodied in Rule 200 III. refer to persons who were trained during the session 1899–1900 and were recognised as teachers before entering the college. His claim to an increment of continued good service salary will be considered this year.

Burial Ground at Leixlip.

MR. LEAMY (Kildare, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if additional burial grounds are needed in Leixlip; and if land can be acquired there either to increase existing burial grounds or for new ones.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) No representations have been made to the Local Government Board on the subject, and it is not aware that there is need for additional burial ground accommodation at Leixlip. The matter is one for the consideration of the local authority in the first instance.

Irish Evicted Tenants—Application of Mr. George Ward for Reinstatement.

MR. HUGH LAW (Donegal, W.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Estates Commissioners have received an application from Mr. George Ward, Tuberkeen, Dungloe, county Donegal, for re-instatement in the farm from which he was evicted; whether the estate upon which his former holding is situated is in the Land Judge's Court, or has been offered for sale to the Estates Commissioners or to the Congested Districts Board; and whether, in event of a sale of the estate, the reinstatement of Ward will be favourably considered.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) An application for reinstatement has been received from G. Ward, and will be considered. The Estates Commissioners have received no application in respect of the sale of the estate. It was offered to the Congested Districts Board, but the Board decided not to purchase it. The estate does not appear to be in the Land Judge's Court.

MR. THOMAS O'DONNELL: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Commissioners of Valuation made a mistake in increasing the valuation of the lands of Mr. M. O'Donnell, Annascaul, county Kerry, by £5, while they decreased the valuation of his neighbour by a similar amount, and that Mr. O'Donnell was thus compelled to pay in rates £1 13s. 9d. through the mistake of a Government Department; and, if so, whether steps will be immediately taken to have this sum refunded to him.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) There is no occupier of land named M. O'Donnell entered in the valuation lists for the townland in which the village of Annascaul is situated. Possibly the holding entered in the lists as occupied by Thomas O'Donnell, in the townland of Dromavally, is referred to. It was part of a large Rundale holding which was divided in 1900 and 1903. The valuations allotted to the various holders in these years were not appealed against, either by him or by any of the other occupiers. A further division and applotment was asked for and made in 1904, the effect of which was to reduce the valuation of O'Donnell's farm, which consists of eight separate lots, by £5. If O'Donnell objected to the former applotment he should have availed himself of his statutory right of appeal to the Commissioner of Valuation and the Court of quarter sessions. There is no power now to re-open the case as suggested.

Colours of Militia Regiments that served in South Africa.

MR. EMMOTT: To ask the Secretary of State for War whether, seeing that Militia regiments which have served abroad during wars previous to the South African War have had the name of the country in which they served added to their colours, it has yet been decided to allow Militia regiments which served in the South African War to add South Africa to their colours.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Arnold-Forster.) I am not at present in a position to give the hon. Member a reply to his Question, but I hope to be able to do so shortly.

Malta Government Balance-Sheet.

MR. BOLAND (Kerry, S.): To ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether in the estimate that the Maltese Government had also to its credit on the 29th of February last the net surplus brought forward from the year 1902–3, viz.: £19,416, the item of £22,939 19s. 10¾d., which is set out in the debtor side of the Treasury Account, is referred to; whether, in the statement of expenditure for the period at £363,279, the ordinary and special advances and waterworks department stores, which together amount to £18,852, are included; and whether he will supply a copy of the balance-sheet issued on 29th February and of the statements which accompanied it.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Lyttelton.) The net surplus of revenue over expenditure for the year 1902–3, viz.: £19,416, is included in the item of £22,939 to which the hon. Member refers. Consequently, if the Colonial Government had had to sell all its investments in Imperial and Colonial Funds on the 29th February the surplus after meeting its liabilities in respect of depreciation would have been £12,780, i.e. the difference between the excess of revenue over expenditure for the period to the 29th February, viz.: £48,385, and the net deficit on the investments, i.e. £35,605, and I desire to correct my reply of the 28th June to this extent. The ordinary and special advances and waterworks department stores are not included in the expenditure account of £363,279 to which the hon. Member refers. A copy of the Gazette containing a copy of the balance-sheet as on the 29th February and of the statements which accompanied it, is enclosed.

Census of the Transvaal.

MR. JOHN ELLIS (Nottinghamshire, Rushcliffe): To ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he can now give a summary of the recent census in the Transvaal showing the following particulars:—number of each sex above the age of sixteen of Dutch and English race in Pretoria, Johannesburg, and the district outside respectively; the like figures of those under sixteen; and the total figures of natives of each sex above sixteen in Pretoria, Johannesburg, and the district outside respectively.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Lyttelton.) The census figures will be published to Parliament this week. They do not distinguish persons of Dutch and English race, but only differentiate between European or white and natives and other coloured persons. This is the practice which has been followed elsewhere in South Africa in taking the census.

The Transvaal Legislative Council.

MR. JOHN ELLIS: To ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he will give the names of the members of the Transvaal Legislative Council, mentioning the official positions occupied by some of them and the professions or avocations of the others, distinguishing those nominated by the High Commissioner from those elected, stating by whom they are elected and also when the life of the present Council expires.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Lyttelton.) The annexed list shows the composition of the Legislative Council of the Transvaal so far as my information goes. I do not know the avocations of five members who were appointed as representing the various sections of the Boer population. Nor do I know the avocation of Mr. Raitt, who was appointed to represent the working classes. I believe that there are now three vacancies caused by the transfer of members who held office. The seven first-named members are so by virtue of their office. The others are appointed individually by the Crown, and in nearly every case their appointments expire in May, 1905. There are no elected members.

Resignation of Sir Charles Eliot—Suggested Committee of Inquiry.

Mr. CATHCART WASON (Orkney and Shetland): To ask the First Lord of the Treasury if the Government intend to appoint a Committee or Commission to investigate the causes of Sir Charles Eliot's resignation in East Africa.

(Answered by Mr. A. J. Balfour.) There seems no reason to adopt the exceptional method proposed. The hon. Member will soon have the Papers in his hands, when I think he will come to the same conclusion.

Native Labour in the Transvaal Mines.

Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): To ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies if he can state the number of coloured persons employed on the last day of March, April, and May of this year in the Transvaal gold mines, calculated on the same basis as the Return given by him on 26th May last, distinguishing between those in employ and at work.

QUESTIONS IN THE HOUSE.

Flogging in the Navy.

Mr. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether he will explain why, although the cat, as an instrument of flogging, has been abolished in the Army, it has only been suspended in the Navy by an order of the Admiralty; will he state why the British seaman is still subject to flogging in naval prisons; and whether, on land or sea, cats are part of the equipment of the naval prisons; and, seeing that the statutory rules and orders as to discipline in naval prisons authorises the infliction of thirty-six lashes or strokes with the cat or birch in the case of a prisoner over eighteen years of age; he will say whether any steps will be taken for the abolition of this punishment in the Royal Navy.

The SECRETARY to the ADMIRALTY (Mr. Pretyman, Suffolk, Woodbridge): Flogging with cat o' nine tails was suspended by an order of the Board of Admiralty in 1881. When the Naval Discipline Act was amended in 1884, the power of awarding this punishment was not abolished but remained merely suspended. There has been no amendment of the Naval Discipline Act since then and it is not likely that legislation would be obtained for this reason only. The rules governing the award of this punishment in the Naval Prison Regulations are practically identical with those contained in the statutory rules and orders for local prisons. The answer to the third part of the Question is "Yes." The fourth part is not understood. There is no intention so far as I am aware of abolishing corporal punishment in the naval prisons.

Mr. SWIFT MACNEILL: Then I take it that the cat is part of the necessary equipment of ships of war and training ships.

Mr. PRETYMAN: That was not the Question addressed to me.

Mr. SWIFT MACNEILL: Is it part of the equipment of naval prisons ashore and afloat?

Mr. PRETYMAN: There are no naval prisons afloat

Mr. FLAVIN (Kerry, N.): Seeing that the cat has been abolished in the Army why retain it for the Navy?

Volunteers in Camp.

Sir HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if there is a record that in a brigade of Volunteers encamped in 1900 on Salisbury Plain 90 per cent. went home in consequence of three days' rain; and, if so, will he state the name of the brigadier, and what regiments constituted the brigade, and who were their respective commanding officers and adjutants, and further by what means, being then under military law, such Volunteers were able to leave the camp.

The SECRETARY of STATE for WAR (Mr. Arnold-Forster, Belfast, W.): I can find no trace in any official record of any such incident as that referred to in the Question. If it occurred it is not creditable to the brigade concerned. I may perhaps add that unwillingness to face hardship or to incur discomfort is certainly not characteristic of the Volunteer Force—a fact to which I can bear personal testimony, and which I believe all those who have been officially connected with the training of Volunteers will readily confirm.

Mr. HERBERT SAMUEL (Yorkshire, Cleveland): I beg to ask the

† To be substituted for Answer previously printed and circulated.

Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, seeing that Article V. of the recent Anglo-Chinese Convention requires that indentured emigrants from China shall be embarked only at a treaty port, the embarkation at Hong-kong of coolies on the steamship "Tweeddale" was a contravention of this treaty; whether the Chinese Viceroy at Canton has forbidden the recruitment of any more coolies for the Transvaal; and, if so, whether his action was taken as a protest against the infraction of the treaty.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. LYTTELTON, Warwick and Leamington): The Anglo-Chinese Convention does not apply to Hong-kong, which is not a treaty port, and there has been no contravention of the treaty. It is true that about two months ago the Viceroy of Canton issued a proclamation declaring recruiting for South Africa in that district illegal. His Majesty's Minister at Peking has made representations to the foreign board, and they have requested the Viceroy to withdraw the prohibition.

MR. HERBERT SAMUEL: Was the prohibition due to the fact that the Chinese authorities considered there had been a contravention of the Treaty?

Number of Chinese already in South Africa.

DR. MACNAMARA (Camberwell, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies if he can now state the total number of men, the total number women, and the total number of children of Chinese extraction who have arrived in South Africa under the Transvaal Labour Ordinance; and, if not, whether he will telegraph to Lord Milner for these facts by cable.

MR. LYTTELTON: I informed the hon. Member for the Cleveland Division on the 7th of last month† that none of the emigrants who have come from Hong-kong had taken their families with them. The number of men is just over 1,000, according to the newspaper telegrams. I do not think it necessary to telegraph to Lord Milner on the subject.

MR. HERBERT SAMUEL: Did any women or children accompany the second batch of coolies?

MR. LYTTELTON asked for notice of the Question.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): May I ask whether these particular coolies were recruited under the early advertisement, in which no mention was made of the fact that they might take their wives and children.

MR. LYTTELTON: My information is that they were fully informed before embarkation that they had a right to take their families with them.

DR. MACNAMARA: Then can the right hon. Gentleman give any reason why no women and children did accompany them?

Treatment of Chinese Coolies at Durban.

MAJOR SEELY (Isle of Wight): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he can now state by whose authority, and under what legal sanction, the Chinese labourers recently landed at Durban in Natal were confined in compounds, and locked in railway carriages, guarded by special police; by whose orders the police were detailed for this duty; and at whose charge they were maintained on this special duty?

MR. LYTTELTON; I am informed by the Acting-Governor of Natal that the Chinese were not placed in guarded compounds; they were conveyed straight from the ship to the train which took them to the Transvaal. I am to receive a report on the circumstances of the landing and despatch of these labourers by mail.

MAJOR SEELY: I have already twice asked this Question and obtained no Answer. I want to know under what Act, by what sanction of law, this confinement was done, and I respectfully press for an Answer.

† See (4) Debates, cxxxv., 923.

MR. LYTTELTON: I have already answered that there was not a confinement.

MAJOR SEELY: There is no doubt that there was a confinement.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! It is not in order to debate the Question.

MAJOR SEELY: Will the right hon. Gentleman state whether the labourers were locked in carriages, which is a deprivation of liberty?

*MR. SPEAKER: I understand that the right hon. Gentleman has already answered the Question "whether he can now state by whose authority and under what legal sanction the Chinese labourers recently landed at Durban in Natal were confined in compounds."

SEVERAL OPPOSITION MEMBERS: And locked in railway carriages.

MR. LYTTELTON: I have already said there was no confinement in compounds. I have no information with regard to the carriages; but, as I have stated on more than one occasion, I am to receive a report on the subject.

MAJOR SEELY: Should not the information on a matter of this importance be communicated to the House by cable?

MR. LYTTELTON: I have not the slightest reason to believe that the Natal Government have done anything contrary to the law. I do not propose to satisfy myself, except in the manner I have already indicated.

Terms of the Chinese Labour Contract.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the form of contract signed by the Chinese labourers before importation to the Transvaal contains any reference to their right to the transport of their wives and children to that country, to the obligation to work for ten hours per diem underground, and to their obligation to be confined in a compound during their term of servitude; whether a copy of the form of contract is in the possession of the Colonial Service; if so, whether he will lay it upon the Table of the House; and, if not, whether he will at once telegraph to the Governor of Hong-kong to transmit by cable the form of contract, and lay it upon the Table of the House on its receipt.

MR. LYTTELTON: The form of the contract signed by the Chinese labourers was, I understand, that printed at pages 28-32 of Cd. 2026.

No Close Time for Chinese Coolies.

MR. LAMBERT (Devonshire, South Molton): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether there is any close time for the admission of Chinese labourers into the Transvaal; and whether any limit is to be placed upon the number to be admitted.

MR. LYTTELTON: No close time has been fixed by the Government nor has any limit at present been placed on the number to be admitted.

Embarkation of Coolies at Hong-kong.

MR. HERBERT SAMUEL: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Chinese labourers, who were embarked for South Africa at the British port of Hong-kong, are excluded from the purview of the recent Anglo-Chinese Convention, and from the protection it would afford, for the reason that the Convention applies only to labourers embarked at Chinese treaty ports.

MR. LYTTELTON: The Convention cannot of course apply to Hong-kong which is not a treaty port but a British Colony. Labourers leaving Hong-kong are protected not by the treaty but by the Colonial law and administration.

Debarkation of Coolies from the "Tweeddale."

DR. MACNAMARA: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been called to the fact that when the ss "Tweeddale" arrived in Durban Harbour on Saturday, 18th June, a floating cordon of pontoons containing police with loaded rifles surrounded her, police with loaded rifles paraded her decks and the wharves, the coolies were photographed and registered under armed supervision, and entrained for Johannesburg under armed military escort; and whether he will ask Lord Milner for a report on these proceedings by cable.

Mr. LYTTELTON: I am expecting to receive by mail a report on the circumstances of the arrival of these coolies, and I do not propose to telegraph.

Major SEELY: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that by the provisions of the Natal Act, Immigration (restricted), 1903, the master and owners of any vessel, from which any person suffering from a loathsome or a dangerous contagious disease may be landed, are liable to a penalty of from £100 to £5,000; whether the master or owners of the British ship "Tweeddale," from which immigrants suffering from beri-beri were landed at Durban, have been subjected to the penalties referred to; and whether he will take steps to warn the masters and owners of British ships of the penalties to which they are liable for any infringement of the provisions of the above Act while engaging in this traffic.

Mr. LYTTELTON: I have telegraphed for information to the Officer Administering the Government of Natal and have received the following answer:—"My Ministers suggest that you give following reply to Question. Begins—'It is the custom in Natal to subject persons to penalties after they have broken the law, not before. The "Tweeddale" did not infringe the Immigration Restriction Act. No British ships are liable to penalties for engaging in this traffic—namely, the conveyance of Chinese immigrants under a scheme approved by the Government of Natal. Both shipmasters and Transvaal Government have been duly informed of our law and of the requirements thereunder.'" It will be observed that the Natal authorities do not consider beri-beri to be a loathsome or dangerous contagious disease.

Major SEELY: The Answer, though somewhat discourteous, does not cover the Question whether in point of fact such persons were landed, and, if so, whether the penalties were inflicted.

Mr. LYTTELTON: The hon. Member is aware that the Natal Government have, as a self-governing colony, Ministers who are the judges on this point—subject to the hon. Member. The Natal Ministers say that there has not been an infraction of the Natal law. [Opposition cries of "Why?"] I presume the reason must be that they are satisfied that beri-beri is not a contagious disease.

Major SEELY: With great respect may I point out that it is not denied that it is a loathsome disease?

*Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. Member is not satisfied he must put down a more specific Question. The Answer given to the Question on the Paper is that, according to the right hon. Gentleman's knowledge and information, no breach of the law has been committed in Natal.

Beri-beri on the "Tweeddale."

Sir WALTER FOSTER (Derbyshire, Ilkeston): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, in view of the fact that forty-three cases of beri-beri developed on board the "Tweeddale" during the voyage from China to Durban, that she was sent back to China with the surviving cases, thirty-five in number, and that beri-beri is a malady which infects a ship or place in which cases of the disease are collected, he will take steps to have this ship discharged from the service of bringing Chinese coolies to South Africa.

Mr. LYTTELTON: I have no reason to doubt that the Transvaal emigration agent at the port of embarkment will take any steps which are necessary in the matter. He has full power to obtain medical advice for his guidance in such matters.

Telegrams to Lord Milner.

Dr. MACNAMARA: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he will give the number and dates of the telegrams he has addressed to Lord

Milner, asking for information respecting the outbreak of the disease beri-beri among the Chinese coolies; what were the dates of the reply or replies from Lord Milner; whether he is in a position to give any explanation of the delay in the receipt of Lord Milner's reply; and whether the text of these telegrams will be reproduced in the Blue-book about to be issued.

Mr. LYTTELTON: The telegrams I addressed to Lord Milner were sent on the 23rd, 25th, and 27th of June, I received an answer from Lord Milner dated 28th of June, and two subsequent telegrams dated 30th June. I gave in reply to the hon. Member for the Rye Division on Thursday last † my explanation as to the delay and have nothing to add thereto. I will include the telegrams in the Blue-book to be published this week.

Chinese Exclusion Bill in Cape Colony.

Mr. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the assent of the Crown to the Chinese Exclusion Bill, to which the Governor of Cape Colony reserved his assent for the consideration of the Crown, while that assent was given to all other measures passed by the Cape Parliament, has yet been given; and, if not, what is the reason for the delay in this formality.

Mr. LYTTELTON: No, Sir; the authenticated copy of the Bill referred to only reached me two days ago.

Representative Government in South Africa.

Mr. LAMBERT: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether any communications have been received from the Transvaal or the Orange River Colony respecting the grant of representative Government; and whether the subject has been considered by Ministers; if so, can any statement be made as to the date when such representative Government will be granted.

Mr. LYTTELTON: I am not in a position at present to make any statement on the subject.

Maltese Finance.

Mr. BOLAND (Kerry, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, in view of the fact that three months have elapsed since the close of the financial year in Malta, he will undertake that a copy of the balance-sheet for the year will be available for Members of the House before the Vote on the Colonial Estimates is taken.

Mr. LYTTELTON: I am communicating the hon. Member's Question to the Governor of Malta, but pending the receipt of his reply, which I am requesting him to furnish by telegraph, I am unable to state at what date the financial statements for the year ending the 31st of March last will be ready.

Mr. BOLAND: I will put a further Question next week.

The Tibetan Mission.

Mr. LAMBERT: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India if he has had information as to the request of the Tibetans for an armistice; and whether competent negotiators have been appointed to settle points of difference; and, if so, has the British Commander authority to receive and treat with such negotiators.

The SECRETARY of STATE for INDIA (Mr. Brodrick, Surrey, Guildford): An armistice was granted up to 30th June and has been prolonged at the request of the Tibetans. The Ta Lama, accompanied by representatives of the three Lhasa monasteries, has been received by Colonel Younghusband and is now in negotiation with him. It is not yet known whether the Ta Lama has authority to effect an agreement with Colonel Younghusband, but in this event the British Commissioner has authority to treat with him.

Mr. FLYNN (Cork County, N.): Are representatives of the Chinese Government allowed to take part in the negotiations?

Mr. BRODRICK: Representatives of the Chinese Government have been in communication with us throughout, and of course will be associated with us in the negotiations.

† See page 156.

Russo-Japanese War—Seizure of the "Allanton."

Mr. WOLFF (Belfast, E.): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is aware that the British steamer "Allanton," whilst proceeding from Marsran, in Japan, to Singapore with a cargo of coals consigned to a British subject, was seized by a Russian vessel and taken to Vladivostock, and has since been condemned there as a prize and confiscated; and will he state what steps His Majesty's Government propose to take in order to obtain the release of the vessel.

The UNDER-SECRETARY of STATE for FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Earl Percy, Kensington, S.): His Majesty's Government are aware of the fact and are in communication on the subject with His Majesty's Ambassador at St. Petersburg, who has asked to be supplied with an official statement of the grounds of condemnation. They understand that the owner of the vessel has taken steps to lodge an appeal, for which a month's time is allowed, to the Supreme Prize Court which will sit at St. Petersburg, and in these circumstances His Majesty's Government must await the decision of that tribunal before deciding what, if any, representation they can properly address to the Russian Government when the full facts of the case are before them.

Mr. WOLFF: Will the appeal be to St. Petersburg?

Earl PERCY: Yes.

Mr. WOLFF: Is nothing being done meanwhile to urge the Russian Government to release the vessel?

Mr. JOSEPH DEVLIN (Kilkenny, N.): Is there an English representative at Vladivostock from whom the owner of the vessel may obtain assistance?

Mr. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): Has an appeal been made?

Earl PERCY: The minimum time for appeal is, I think, a month; perhaps a little longer.

Mr. T. W. RUSSELL: If the captain and crew are confined, how can an appeal be made? It is a very serious matter for the owners of this Belfast vessel.

International Maritime Conference at Brussels.

Mr. CHARLES McARTHUR (Liverpool, Exchange): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he will state the grounds upon which His Majesty's Government has decided to decline to be officially represented at the forthcoming International Conference to be held at Brussels to promote greater uniformity in the laws of the different maritime States with respect to collision and salvage liabilities.

Earl PERCY: His Majesty's Government have, in accordance with a long established and carefully considered policy, declined to be officially represented at the Conference on the grounds that their participation might be held to bind them to accept its conclusions. They will, however, take steps to secure full information of the discussions and of the decisions arrived at by the Conference.

Mr. CHARLES McARTHUR: Does the Answer imply that a representative will be sent, but he will not have power to vote?

Earl PERCY: We shall probably instruct our Minister there to obtain a full report of the proceedings.

Circulation in England of Foreign Lottery Circulars.

Sir THOMAS DEWAR (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is aware that circular letters associated with lottery drawings conducted by H. Langenhann & Company, Bremen, were on the 22nd June last posted at the Western Central District Office, London, to persons in the United Kingdom; and, seeing that his attention has been directed to similar circulars in connection with a lottery at Budapest will he state what action he proposes to take in the matter.

Earl PERCY: The receipt in this country of lottery circulars from the firm in question was recently brought to the notice of the Foreign Office. His Majesty's Ambassador at Berlin, who was consulted on the subject, was of opinion that, as the Prussian Diet were considering the adoption of measures to check the issue of lottery circulars from the minor German States, no action on the part of His Majesty's Government was for the present desirable.

Protection of British Interests at Niuchwang.

MR. JOSEPH WALTON (Yorkshire, W.R., Barnsley): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, in view of the reported withdrawal of the Russians from Niuchwang, the active operations of brigands in the neighbourhood, and the uncertainty as to when a Japanese occupation will take place, also that Niuchwang is not now likely to be the scene of naval operations, His Majesty's Government will send a gunboat to Niuchwang for the protection of the lives and property of British subjects.

EARL PERCY: His Majesty's Government have no reason to believe that the Russians have withdrawn from Niuchwang, but the "Espiègle" has been ordered to that port.

Licensing Bill — Value of Licensed Premises Affected.

MR. CATHCART WASON (Orkney and Shetland): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will state approximately the value of the licensed premises to which the Bill before the House applies; the maximum capitalised amount that could be raised by quarter sessions for the purpose of closing specified licensed premises; the approximate extra value that would be given to the licensed premises remaining by the decreased competition and by the absolute fixity of tenure secured for a long period.

*THE SECRETARY of STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. AKERS-DOUGLAS, Kent, St. Augustine's): I am afraid I am no more able now than I was a few days ago†, when the hon. Member asked me the same Question, to give him any such figures as he desires.

Amendment of Workmen's Compensation Act.

SIR THOMAS DEWAR: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is yet in a position to state to what trades the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act will be extended.

*MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS: The Report of the Departmental Committee has not yet reached me, and until I get it I cannot give the hon. Gentleman the information he desires.

North Eastern Railway—Unprotected Live Rails.

MR. RENWICK (Newcastle-on-Tyne): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the fact that another death was caused by the unprotected electric live rail on the North Eastern Railway at St. Peters, Newcastle-on-Tyne, on Wednesday last; and will he inform the House what steps are being taken by the Board of Trade to compel railway companies owning electric railways to take such steps as are necessary to avoid further loss of life.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. GERALD BALFOUR, Leeds, Central): The accident referred to, which caused death of a boy who had trespassed on the line, has been reported to the Board of Trade by the railway company. Inquiries have been ordered into the circumstances attending two similar previous accidents, and this case will also be investigated. When the reports of the inspecting officers have been received the question of precautionary measures will be fully considered.

Solway Fishery Bill.

MR. CLAUDE LOWTHER (Cumberland, Eskdale): I beg to ask the hon. Member for North Huntingdonshire as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, whether he is now in a position to state on what day this session he proposes to introduce the Solway Fishery Bill, which he has stated to be in a forward state of preparation.

† See page 163.

MR. AILWYN FELLOWES (Huntingdonshire, Ramsey): I am unable for the moment to specify the day upon which the Solway Fishery Bill will be introduced, but if my hon. friend will put down his Question again in a few days time I shall hope to be in a position to give a more definite answer.

MR. KILBRIDE (Kildare, S.): Can the hon. Gentleman say if it is intended to introduce any other legislation this session?

Rathmines Polling District Dispute.

MR. MOONEY (Dublin County, S.): I beg to ask Mr. Attorney-General for Ireland if his attention has been called to complaints from the Rathmines Polling District of South Dublin to the effect that the voters' requisition forms, provided for by statute and distributed by the town clerk of Rathmines (in his capacity of deputy for the clerk of the peace of Dublin County) were in many instances, and to an extent calculated to interfere with the discharge of his duty by the town clerk, taken away from the custody of those residents to whom they were issued by unauthorised persons, inaccurately filled up and returned to the said town clerk; and, if so, whether he proposes to take any, and, if so, what action to secure that these inaccuracies shall be corrected and the persons entitled, and these only, placed on the supplemental list.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. ATKINSON, Londonderry, N.): My attention has been called to the matter mentioned, which has been referred to the police for investigation.

Rathmines Commissioners' Appeal.

MR. MOONEY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if his attention has been called to the delay of the Local Government Board in giving their decision on the appeal of the Rathmines Commissioners against the decision of the Dublin County Council; and when this decision may be expected.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. WYNDHAM, Dover): There has been no delay. The Inquiry was held at the end of May. The minutes of evidence, which are voluminous, were received by the Board on the 10th June. A decision will be come to as soon as possible.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Have the Local Government Board consulted the Law Officers of the Crown on this matter?

MR. WYNDHAM: I must ask for notice of that.

Irish Land Purchase—Ballydonlon Estate, County Galway.

MR. ROCHE (Galway, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the sale of the Ballydonlon Estate, county Galway the property of Mr. Mahon; whether he is aware that the tenants who held eleven months lettings on this property for a number of years past enjoyed same at an average rental of £1 1s. per acre free of taxes; and that, under the present purchase arrangements on this property, the instalment rentals per acre are increased on the tenants from £1 5s. to £1 15s. per acre, with taxes added; and, if so, whether it is proposed to pass this sale without inspection; and whether, having regard to the fact that Mr. Mahon is not selling the whole of this estate, the bonus will be granted in this case.

MR. WYNDHAM: The entire estate has been sold, but the vendor has applied for an advance to enable him to repurchase the demesne. The holdings were vested in the tenant purchasers on the 29th April. The average annuity payable per statute acre is 19s. 10d. The estate was inspected before the advances were sanctioned.

Winter Dairying in Ireland.

MR. MURPHY (Kerry, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Department of Agriculture have taken any, and what, steps to promote winter dairying in Ireland; and what has been the result of the operations.

MR. WYNDHAM: The encouragement of winter dairying, wherever such is practicable, is part of the duty of the itinerant instructors in agriculture, of whom there are now eighteen at work. No statistics are available to show to what extent farmers have adopted the suggestions of these experts; but the subject will form part of the discussion at the Annual Conference of Itinerant Inspectors.

Mr. MURPHY: Has not a complaint been received from the Cork School that nothing has been done in this respect?

Mr. WYNDHAM: There is no mention of any complaint in the Question. As I have said, there are eighteen inspectors now on this work.

Mr. MURPHY: But they are doing nothing.

Mr. KILBRIDE: Have not the inspectors pointed out that capital is necessary to enable them to carry out the work?

Mr. WYNDHAM: I must ask for notice of that Question.

Captain DONELAN (Cork County, E.): And is it not the fact that the creamery system in Ireland is proving a discouragement to dairy farming in that country?

Land Purchase in County Cavan—David Finlay's Estate.

Mr. VINCENT KENNEDY (Cavan, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Irish Land Commission has been notified by tenant purchasers on the estate of David Finlay and others, near Bawnboy, in the county of Cavan, that the receivable orders which have been sent from its offices in Dublin have not been delivered to the tenants; and, if so, will he say who is responsible for their non-delivery.

Mr. WYNDHAM: I am in communication with the Land Commission in the matter, and will ask the hon. Member to postpone this and the next Question till Wednesday.

The second Question referred to was as follows—

Mr. VINCENT KENNEDY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that a number of the tenants on the estate of David Finlay and others, near Bawnboy, in the county of Cavan (which is under the control of the Land Judge's Court) who have signed their purchase agreements have been notified by the Irish Land Commission that their applications to purchase their holdings have been dismissed owing to delay; if so, will he state the cause of the delay; and, if the delay does not rest with the tenants, will they still be afforded an opportunity of completing their purchase.

Tenants' Game Rights—The Clanricarde Tenants at Woodford.

Mr. ROCHE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether five of the Clanricarde tenants at Derrygoolan, Woodford, have been served with notices to quit in consequence of their asserting their right to the game on their lands.

Mr. ROCHE: I beg also to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, (1) whether he can say if the Clanricarde tenants at Derrygoolan, Woodford, are non-judicial and in possession of their holdings as tenants from year to year for many years; and (2) whether there is any agreement in writing or otherwise made by them with their landlord in respect to game; and (3) whether, in view of the circumstances of the case, he will take steps to insure that the police shall not be allowed in future to accompany poachers on the lands, seeing that such proceedings are calculated to intimidate the tenants.

Mr. WYNDHAM: Five notices to quit have been served. No cause was assigned for their issue. I understand that no judicial rents have been fixed on this property in the locality mentioned. This being so, I am unable to say whether there exist any agreements, such as referred to; nor have I at my disposal any effective means of ascertaining the fact. In the absence of any information I presume the tenants are entitled under the Ground Game Act of 1880 to kill ground game. The fact that a notice to quit has been served upon a tenant does not prevent him from selling his holding or applying to have a fair rent fixed, and should any proceedings, founded on the notices, be taken to evict him from his holding he may apply to the Court in which the proceedings have been instituted to suspend the proceedings pending the result of the fair-rent application. Should the proceedings be suspended and the application to fix a fair rent be granted, the tenant will be in the same position as if his rent had been fixed at the date of the application, and will be protected from eviction from any cause other than one of those statutory conditions for which a judicial tenant may be evicted. Should the landlord in the case be not entitled to the right he seeks to exercise, of course the tenant has his remedy at law in any action of trespass.

MR. KILBRIDE: The right hon. Gentleman has not replied to the last part of the Question—what instructions will you give to the police on the 12th August next? Are they to protect the poachers going on the lands of these tenants who, as he admits, are entitled to the game under the Act?

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: If these are yearly tenants does not that constitute them future tenants and, if so, what is the use of talking of fair rents when future tenants cannot get fair rents fixed?

MR. WYNDHAM: The hon. Member has put the Question correctly. They are not judicial tenants. They are tenants at will. They are precisely the same as tenants at will in this country. I cannot tell if they have any right by agreement with their landlord or not other than the right conferred under Lord Cairns' Act.

MR. ROCHE: Is the right hon. Gentleman not aware that under the law the game belongs to the tenants, and in face of that assumption—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! If the hon. Member states any particular in which the Question has not been fully answered he is at liberty to ask, but——

MR. ROCHE: Under these circumstances, if they go on the land on the 12th August next, will he be responsible for the consequences?

MR. WYNDHAM: I have answered that. I decline, by any act upon my part, to decide a right which is not before me. If the right, as the hon. Gentleman says, is a clear one, the tenants can prosecute.

Irish Workhouse Classification.

MR. REDDY (King's County, Birr): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland what is the principle on which Irish workhouses are classified; and whether he will grant a Return giving the workhouses at present included in the various classes under which they are arranged.

MR. WYNDHAM: There is no classification of workhouses. The Poor Law Commission now sitting was appointed to investigate the question of the amalgamation of workhouses, and the practicability of making better provision for the classification and treatment of the inmates. As a result of this investigation I hope it may be found possible to institute such a classification.

Enniskillen Rent Appeals.

MR. EDWARD MITCHELL (Fermanagh, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that it is a considerable time since the Land Commission sat at Enniskillen to hear appeals for fixing rents; if he will say when said Commission will next sit, in view of the number of cases awaiting their decision.

MR. WYNDHAM: The last sitting of the Appeal Court at Enniskillen was in January, 1903. The Appeal Sittings for the Michaelmas term have not yet been arranged, but when settling the circuit the Commissioners will consider whether it is practicable to arrange a further sitting at Enniskillen before the close of present year.

Bawnboy Rent Disputes.

MR. VINCENT KENNEDY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that

Mr. A. E. Humphrys, of Lisagoan House, county of Cavan (a justice of the peace), marked judgment against seven of his tenants on an estate near Bawnboy, in the county of Cavan, that these judgments were executed by the sheriff with an escort of constables, and that these judgments were set aside; and, if so, whether he will take steps to protect these tenants from such proceedings at the hands of Mr. Humphrys in future; and if his action will be brought under the notice of the Lord Chancellor with a view of depriving him of his commission of the peace.

MR. WYNDHAM: Certain writs of execution for recovery of rent were lodged with the sheriff by Mr. Humphrys for execution against three of his tenants. The sheriff, whose duty it was to execute these, requisitioned police protection. I am not aware whether the judgments on which these writs were issued have been set aside, but, if so, the tenants will no doubt have their legal remedy. It is not the privilege of the sheriff to hold any investigation into the legality of the judgments upon which writs of execution are based. His duty is to execute the writs lodged with him which appear correct, on their face, nor is the Executive entitled to refuse protection on any such ground.

Sir Roger Palmer's Estate, County Mayo.

MR. JOSEPH DEVLIN: On behalf of the hon. Member for East Mayo, I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the estate of Sir Roger Palmer, in county Mayo, has been offered for sale to the Estates Commissioners or to the Congested Districts Board.

MR. WYNDHAM: The estate in question has not yet been offered for sale to either the Commissioners or to the Congested Districts Board.

Enniskillen Dispensary Districts.

MR. JORDAN (Fermanagh, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if his attention has been drawn to a report by Dr. M'Carthy, on the 30th May, to the Local Government Board in reference to six dispensary districts composing the union of Enniskillen, namely, that the medical officer's attendance and report books, and the medical relief register of cases and the midwife's register, were not sent to the guardians for examination, and that no arrangement has been made for the examination of the dispensary records; is he aware that the guardians, in view of the importance of such examinations, in the interest of the poor, and for the due discharge of the Medical Charities Acts by all officials concerned, on the 12th of August, 1902, requested the Local Government Board to sanction the appointment of local committees, consisting of the guardians representing the dispensary district, the clergymen of all churches, and five ratepayers in each district; the committee to meet monthly, examine the doctor's books, and report to the board of guardians; and, if so, will he, in view of the fact that the doctor's books have not been examined since the passing of the Local Government Act of 1898, and of the difficulty of inducing guardians to remain after the business of the board has terminated, take into consideration the necessity of devising some plan by which an effective examination of the doctor's books may be performed with the least tax on guardians' time.

MR. WYNDHAM: Section 30 of the Act of 1898 abolished dispensary committees and transferred their business to the board of guardians. Consequently the Local Government Board was unable to sanction the arrangement proposed in August, 1902. It is open to the guardians under Article 10 of the Dispensary Rules to appoint a small committee of its members for the purposes mentioned in the Question. In the majority of the unions the guardians themselves examine the books. Elsewhere the duty has been delegated to a committee of guardians with satisfactory results.

Congestion in South Kerry.

MR. BOLAND: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state how many landlords owning estates in the congested districts of South Kerry have offered their estates to the Congested Districts Board for resale to the tenants; can he state the terms demanded from the Board; and has the condition of the money market militated against the successful operation of the Land Act of 1903 in the congested districts of Ireland?

Mr. WYNDHAM: Negotiations are pending with eight landlords. Until these have been concluded no statement can be made in respect to the terms. The reply to the concluding query is in the negative.

Mr. FLAVIN: What has been the price demanded by the landlords?

Mr. WYNDHAM: It would be most improper for me to express any opinion as to the terms, either on one side or the other.

Promotion of Irish National School Teachers.

Mr. SLOAN (Belfast, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he can state the number of national school teachers who have received promotion whose record was "fair" for the three years ending 31st March, 1903, together with the number promoted whose record was less than "fair" for the same period.

Mr. WYNDHAM: I am informed that no teachers received promotion whose records were merely "fair" for the three years ended 31st March, 1903, and that no teachers received promotion whose records were less than "fair" for the same period.

Government Advances for Harbour Works in Ireland.

Mr. CHARLES CRAIG (Antrim, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, if the Irish Government are about to advance £100,000 for harbour works in the neighbourhood of Belmullet, county Mayo; and, if so, is this sum by loan or grant, and if by loan on what terms; how much has this county received for like purposes since 1883, including the present advance; and what sums have in the same period been advanced to the county of Antrim for similar purposes.

Mr. WYNDHAM: If all the arrangements imposed by statute with the county council, railway company, and other interested parties are, as I trust may be the case, satisfactorily concluded, a sum of over £90,000 may probably be issued in respect of works in Mayo as a free grant under the Marine Works Act of 1902. That Act, in common with the Railways Act of 1896 and the Railways Act of 1890 (Mr. A. J. Balfour's Act) provides for free grants in connection only with counties of which portions are scheduled as congested. No sums under those Acts are applicable to other parts of Ireland, and no comparison can be usefully instituted between such exceptional expenditure in a 'congested' county and ordinary expenditure in an uncongested county, except for the purpose of criticising a policy consistently pursued since the year 1890. The Sea Fisheries Act of 1883 was of general application. Under it Antrim received a free grant of £1,342, and Mayo a free grant of £27,520, and a loan of £2,773. I am inquiring what are the sums granted or lent in respect of county Mayo by the Congested Districts Board under the Act of 1891, and in respect of Antrim from other sources since the year 1883.

Mr. MACVEAGH (Down, S.): As a matter of fact, has the hon. Member informed the right hon. Gentleman of the necessity for a harbour grant for this county?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order, order!

Irish University Education.

Mr. MACVEAGH: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in view of its bearing on the question of University education in Ireland, he will assent to the Return standing on to-day's Paper in the name of the hon. Member for South Down.

Mr. WYNDHAM: No, Sir; I cannot see my way to assent to the proposed Return. It would involve a departure from precedent inexpedient in itself, and ineffective for the object which the hon. Member contemplates, inasmuch as it would take no cognisance of the larger number of officials employed in the various other Departments of the State in Ireland, for which I am not answerable, and the still larger number of Irishmen holding Crown appointments outside Ireland.

MR. MACVEAGH: Is the objection to granting this Return to be found in the fact that there is a boycott of Catholics in Ireland—

Appended is the Notice of Motion referred to—

Government Departments (Ireland) (Officials).—Return setting forth the names, salaries, and places of education of the salaried officials in the different Government Departments under the jurisdiction of the Chief Secretary for Ireland.

Lough Leagh Land Proprietors' Meeting.

MR. JOSEPH DEVLIN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to a meeting convened by the Board of Works, of proprietors of lands in Lough Leagh district, which was held in the county Antrim Courthouse, Belfast, on 24th June, for the purpose of appointing trustees, not exceeding fifteen in number; whether such meeting was fully advertised beforehand; whether he is aware that when a vote was taken it was found that the proprietors were outweighed by proxies; whether these proxies were obtained and used in a legal manner; and, if not, whether he will order a new election; whether, in view of the present system of administering the Trust by men who are not ratepayers and who do not reside in the flooded district, he will consider the advisability of transferring the powers and duties of the Trust to the local authorities of the several parts of the district comprising the flooded area.

MR. WYNDHAM: The meeting was convened by the Board of Works and advertised as prescribed by Section 120 of the Act 5 and 6 Vict., cap. 89. The secretary to the drainage trustees states that the proxies were in a majority. I have no reason to suppose that they were obtained or used in an illegal manner. The trustees are elected by the proprietors in the district, who are liable for payment of the rate for maintaining the drainage works. The law imposes no restriction upon the choice of trustees by the electors, and there appears to be no ground for interfering with that choice.

MR. JOSEPH DEVLIN: Would the right hon. Gentleman say whether this Trust is administered by those who are not ratepayers and who do not reside in the district?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY (Mr. VICTOR CAVENDISH, Derbyshire, W.): I understand the trustees are elected by the ratepayers.

MR. JOSEPH DEVLIN: Does the Chief Secretary intend to allow the administration of this Trust by men who have no authority or right to do so?

MR. WYNDHAM: The matter rests with my hon. friend the Secretary to the Treasury.

Complaints of Rev. R. D. Patterson of St. Barnabas Church, Dublin.

MR. SLOAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Rev. R. D. Patterson, of St. Barnabas Church, Dublin, has on several occasions complained to the police authorities that divine service in his church has been disturbed by the throwing of stones upon the roof, and that the notice board in front of the church has been damaged; and whether, in view of the fact that this clergyman when walking the public street is followed by persons calling him offensive names, he will explain why no action has been taken by the police upon these complaints.

MR. WYNDHAM: Yes, Sir. Several complaints have been made. The reply which I gave on the 22nd June† was based on reports of communications made to the police by the Rev. Mr. Patterson on the 2nd May and by his Rector, the Rev. Mr. Griffin, on the 5th May. I now find that Mr. Patterson renewed his complaints on the 10th May, and again on the 28th June. I can assure my hon. friend that the police have been instructed to protect the rev. gentleman from annoyance and that they do their best to carry out the instructions they have received.

West Coast of Ireland Fish-Curing Stations.

Mr. SHEEHAN (Cork County, Mid.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Congested Districts Board make it a condition of letting their fish-curing stations on the west coast to fish buyers for the autumn season that the prices paid by buyers must be approved by the Board; if so, will he explain the necessity for it; has objection been made to this condition by any buyer on the ground that it interfered with freedom of bargaining with the fishermen; how many applications have been made for the stations at Porturlin, county Mayo; did Mr. S. G. Gott occupy one of these last year; if so, under what conditions; and have any negotiations passed between him and the Board for a sub-letting during the forthcoming autumn.

Mr. WYNDHAM: Such a condition is imposed by the Board. The object is to protect the fishermen against unfair prices being fixed by a merchant who virtually enjoys a monopoly by reason of his having acquired from the Board the only available curing station in the district. No buyer has objected to the condition on the ground stated. Two applications were received this year for the station at Porturlin. Mr. Gott signed the agreement last year; he declined to do so this season.

The McGillycuddy Estate.

Mr. BOLAND: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that, in the case of the McGillycuddy Estate, which is now in the Land Judge's Court, and in which an order for sale has been made, a number of tenants, including Mr. Jeremiah J. Doyle, of Whitefield, have been excluded from negotiations without any satisfactory cause; and whether representations will be made to have a sale to all the tenants carried out.

Mr. WYNDHAM: I have been informed that proceedings are in progress for the sale of the entire of this estate, and that it is not the intention of the owner to exclude any tenant who may desire and agree to purchase his holding.

Mr. MURPHY: May I point out I am personally aware that this tenant has been excluded?

Insanitary Condition of Dee Street, Belfast.

Mr. JOSEPH DEVLIN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that in the Dee Street of Belfast there are over 200 houses without any sanitary conveniences; and whether, in view of the outbreak of smallpox in that city, steps will be taken to induce the Corporation to more efficiently perform its duty under the Public Health Acts.

Mr. WYNDHAM: I am informed by the town clerk that there are only 106 houses in Dee Street, and that all have proper sanitary accommodation. The corporation have taken, and are taking, all necessary steps to carry out their duties under the Public Health Acts, and on Friday last adopted plans at a cost of £40,000 for the more efficient sewering of the two outlying districts recently added to the city.

Kerry Letter Deliveries.

Mr. MURPHY: I beg to ask the Postmaster-General whether he will arrange for a daily delivery of letters in the townlands of Readrinagh, Knockdoorah, Meentogues, Stagmount, Gortnaglagh, and Connearagh, between Headfort and Rathmore county Kerry, seeing that the district is thickly populated and includes two schools.

The POSTMASTER-GENERAL (Lord Stanley, Lancashire, Westhoughton): Enquiry is being made on the subject. When it is completed I will acquaint the hon. Member with the result.

Belfast Post Office—Money Order Counter Funds.

Mr. SLOAN: I beg to ask the Postmaster-General, if he can explain under what circumstances did the funds at the money order counter in Belfast become exhausted on the 28th ultimo; is he aware that this has happened on several occasions; and whether, in view of the fact that the public were detained pending arrangements being made with the bank, he will give instructions for adequate arrangements for the prompt disposal of the public demands.

Lord STANLEY: I am informed that on 28th June the cash in the hands of one of the clerks at the counter was exhausted by the presentation of a Savings Bank Warrant for a considerable sum. He at once took steps to obtain a fresh supply; and no serious inconvenience seems to have been caused to the public. There does not appear to have been any other case recently in which the funds at the money order counter were exhausted.

Mr. SLOAN: But is it not the fact that this has occurred several times, though perhaps not recently?

Lord STANLEY: I am not told so.

Mr. SLOAN: It is the case.

Belfast Mails—Proposed Supplementary Service.

Mr. CHARLES CRAIG: I beg to ask the Postmaster-General if he will authorise a supplementary mail bag to be despatched from Belfast for London and other English towns, viâ Greenore and Holyhead, by the train leaving Belfast at 6.45 p.m., and arriving in London at 7.30 a.m., thus giving the public of Belfast more than an hour extra in which to reply to their English correspondence.

Lord STANLEY: As the hon. Member is no doubt aware there are already three dispatches in the evening from Belfast of London correspondence. It hardly appears that the expense involved for a fourth despatch would be justified. I am, however, in correspondense with the railway companies in regard to an acceleration of the Stranraer service which, if afforded, would, I hope, go far to meet the wishes of the public in Belfast. I may point out to the hon. Member that there is already a later service from Belfast (viâ Fleetwood) than the service viâ Greenore which he wishes to be used, and that letters sent viâ Fleetwood arrive in London in ample time to be answered the same afternoon.

London Delivery of Belfast Mails—Alleged Delay.

Mr. CHARLES CRAIG: I beg to ask the Postmaster-General, if he is aware that letters from Belfast for London viâ Fleetwood are not delivered in the City before 2 o'clock, although they arrive at Euston before 11; and, if so, will he take steps to have an earlier delivery.

Lord STANLEY: The mail from Belfast viâ Fleetwood is due at Euston at 10.50 a.m., too late for the City delivery, commencing at 11.20 a.m. It is accordingly included in the next delivery which begins at 12.20 p.m. and is completed about 2.0 p.m.

Great Southern and Western Railway of Ireland—Glounbawn Level Crossing.

Mr. MURPHY: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that the Great Southern and Western Railway Company on their line of railway from Gortatlea to Castleisland have removed the gatesman and locked the gate leading to a passage across the line hitherto used by the people of Gurrane, Glounbawn, and Ballymacpierce; and, if so, whether he proposes to take any steps to compel the company to carry out their obligations in this matter.

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: The Board of Trade communicated with the Great Southern and Western Railway Company on the subject of the Question and learn from them that the company assumes it refers to an accommodation crossing at Glounbawn where the gates have been provided with locks, of which keys are supplied to persons entitled to use the crossing. The hon. Member's Question is not very specific as to the position of the crossing, but if the assumption that it is merely what is called an accommodation crossing is correct the company would not appear to have violated their obligations in this respect.

Mr. MURPHY: I will send the right hon. Gentleman a specific statement on the subject.

Fraudulent Balance-sheets.

Mr. T. W. RUSSELL: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the amendment of the law on the subject of fraudulent balance-sheets, promised as soon as possible during the debate on 19th February, 1903, will be introduced during the present session.

The PRIME MINISTER and FIRST LORD of the TREASURY (Mr. A. J. Balfour, Manchester, E.): I should be very unwilling to add to the present programme of the Government, except in relation to Bills which are necessary for administrative reasons, unless the Bill which was added to that programme was of a genuinely uncontentious character. I suppose I may count on my hon. friend's support for the Motion before the House, which will, no doubt, add to the opportunities for Government business.

Mr, SWIFT MACNEILL: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that he promised this Bill a year and a half ago?

Mr. T. W. RUSSELL: If the right hon. Gentleman cannot promise a Bill this session, will he give the House an opportunity of discussing this question on the Vote for the salaries of the Law Officers of the Crown?

Finance Bill.

Mr. JOHN ELLIS (Nottinghamshire, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he proposes to proceed with the Finance Bill immediately on the conclusion of the Report stage of the Licensing Bill.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: As at present advised I propose to proceed with the Finance Bill when the proceedings in Committee on the Licensing Bill are concluded.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs): I have to ask the Prime Minister whether he can make any statement as to business, and particularly as to the Supply for Thursday.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I understand it will be most convenient that the Irish Estimates shall be taken on Thursday.

Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The right hon. Gentleman is not yet able to say anything about the War Office Vote?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir. It cannot be taken next Thursday, but I hope there will be no long delay.

LICENSING BILL (PROCEDURE).

Order read, for resuming adjourned debate on Amendment to Question [1st July], "That the proceedings in Committee and on Report of the Licensing Bill shall be brought to a conclusion in the manner hereinafter mentioned in six allotted days—

(a) The proceedings in Committee on Clause 1 on the first allotted day.

(b) The proceedings in Committee on Clauses 2 and 3 on the second allotted day.

(c) The proceedings in Committee on Clause 4 on the third allotted day.

(d) The proceedings in Committee on the remaining clauses of the Bill, and on any new Government clauses, and on schedules and any new Government schedules, and any other proceedings necessary to bring the Committee stage to a conclusion on the fourth allotted day.

(e) The proceedings on Report on any new clauses and on Amendments to Clauses 1, 2, and 3 of that Bill, he brought to a conclusion on the fifth allotted day; and

(f) The proceedings on Report be concluded on the sixth allotted day.

After this order comes into operation, any day shall be considered an allotted day for the purposes of this Order on which the Licensing Bill is put down as the first Order of the Day.

At 11 p.m. on the said allotted days, or if the day is a Friday at 4.30 p.m., the Chairman or Speaker shall put forthwith the Question or Questions on any Amendment or Motion already proposed from the Chair, and shall next proceed successively to put forthwith the Question on any Amendments moved by the Government of which notice has been given (but no other Amendments) and on every Question necessary to dispose of the allotted business to be concluded on the allotted day.

In the case of Government Amendments, or of Government new clauses or schedules, he shall put only the Question that the Amendment be made, or that the clause or schedule be added to the Bill, as the case may be.

At twelve midnight of the day on which the Third Reading of the Bill is put down as first order, or, if that day is a Friday, at 5.30 p.m., the Speaker shall put forthwith any Question necessary to conclude the proceedings on that stage of the Bill.

Proceedings to which this Order relates shall not be interrupted (except at an afternoon sitting at 7.30 p.m.), under the provisions of any Standing Order relating to Sittings of the House.

After the passing of this Order, on any day on which any proceedings on the Licensing Bill stand as the first Order of the Day, no dilatory Motion on the Bill, nor under Standing Order No. 10, nor Motion to postpone a clause, shall be received, unless moved by the Minister in charge of the Bill, and the Question on any such Motion shall be put forthwith. Nor shall any opposed private business be set down at the Evening Sitting for consideration on any of the allotted days, or on the day on which the Third Reading of the Bill is put down as first Order.

If Progress be reported, the Chairman shall put this Order in force in any subsequent sitting of the Committee."—(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

Which Amendment was—

"In line 1, to leave out all the words after the word 'That' and insert the words 'this House declines to consider a proposal to deprive the House of Commons, without any justification in the previous course of the debate, of all power of reasonable and adequate discussion in respect of a measure which seeks, in the absence of any authority from the country, to make fundamental and much controverted changes in laws vitally affecting the well-being of the people."—(Mr. Asquith.)

Question again proposed, "That the words 'the proceedings' stand part of the Question."

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Montrose Burghs): I should not have ventured to intervene in this discussion, but for the very remarkable proposition on which the Prime Minister, in making his Motion, founded his case. I confess that I listened with something like alarm to the language that then fell from the Prime Minister. I seemed to hear foreshadowed that a further Parliamentary revolution was to be added, in his opinion definitely and deliberately, by his Procedure Rules and by utterances that had fallen from him with a full responsibility, to that other revolution to which I think he has already shown us the way since last September—a revolution in the great organ of our Constitution, the solidarity and loyalty of Cabinet Government. I think this Motion, supported by the arguments which the right hon. Gentleman founded his case upon, marks as huge a stride in a revolution of Parliamentary power, Parliamentary authority, and Parliamentary fame as has ever taken place in our history. There have been five guillotine or closure Motions within recent years. The hon. Member for Altrincham said that we on this side had taken the initiative in regard to the guillotine closure. That is a complete misstatement. The first two guillotine closures were taken under the auspices of the present Prime Minister, and were taken in reference to the Parnell Commission Bill and the Crimes Act. The next two were taken in the Government of Mr. Gladstone and of Lord Rosebery. The first was the Home Rule Bill and the second the Evicted Tenants Bill. There has been a fifth guillotine closure Motion, which, for the first time, was on an English Bill. I would have the House note that the first four guillotine closures were all connected with Irish business, and that fact sheds a very considerable light on the difference in treatment that Ireland has experienced from England and Scotland in this House. The fifth guillotine closure was in 1902. I venture to assert that in all those five closures, both in the four Irish closures and in the fifth, or English, closure, two things were alleged by the Government who made the Motion corresponding to that which we are now discussing, the first urgency and the second obstruction. I was in the House during all those closures, and

I believe I am perfectly right in making that statement. I think I might note a third point—namely, that in all the three cases there had been very large and ample discussion, less, for reasons I will touch on, in the case of the Evicted Tenants Bill than in the case of the other four closures. What I want to call the attention of the House to is the new departure which the Ministry are making in the proposal they now advance. They do not contend that there has been obstruction. The silence of hon. Gentlemen opposite with which I am met when making that statement——

THE PRIME MINISTER AND FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I did not say so.

MR. JOHN MORLEY: Really the right hon. Gentleman, I thought, the other afternoon, if he will allow me to say so without disrespect, was rather playing with the House. Now he says he did not say so. But what did he say? He carefully abstained on Friday from even suggesting that there was obstruction. Then he does not base his case on obstruction.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes, I accept that statement, not the other one.

MR. JOHN MORLEY: Yes, he does not base his case on obstruction. I trust that hon. Gentlemen opposite, and those who support them and the Government in the Press, will note that this Motion is not based upon obstruction.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Not necessarily.

MR. JOHN MORLEY: I do not care what it is necessarily based on; I say that previously this Motion always has been based on obstruction, as one of the elements——

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, I think the right hon. Gentleman is wrong there. I have not referred to my own speech, but I do not believe he will find that I thought it worth while to allude to the obstruction in the case of the Education Bill, and I am by no means sure that obstruction formed a larger part of the argument of Mr. Gladstone over the Home Rule Bill and the Evicted Tenants Bill.

MR. JOHN MORLEY: That cannot apply to the Evicted Tenants Bill, because Mr. Gladstone had then retired from Parliament. As to the closure on the Education Bill I cannot contradict the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I may be wrong, but I think that was so.

MR. JOHN MORLEY: However, we will not argue that further. This Motion, this strong, drastic Motion for closure, is not based, as certainly three others of the four were based, upon obstruction. But it is not worth while to press that, because my point is that the right hon. Gentleman has advanced to a much broader position, rightly or wrongly, than has ever before been taken by a Minister making such a Motion as this. It is most remarkable, and nothing can be more worthy of the attention of the House. What does he say? He invites us—these are his points—

> "To consider this Motion in relation to the whole course, not merely of Parliamentary business in this session, but in any session. And it is because on the broadest principles that I believe there is no course open to us but that which I have adopted that I am now asking the House to adopt it."

Then he says—

> "The Parliamentary machine cannot be expected to work smoothly, efficiently, or reasonably, if too great a tax is put upon it."

as regards the duration of the session, or the labours of the session. The labours of the session! I have been over twenty years a Member of this House, and I do not think I have ever known a session—I have known many more than twenty sessions—as to which labour could be so little credited. I understand the anxieties of the session, the artifices and manœuvres of the session, the changes in relation to the order of procedure which the Government have submitted to the House. I understand, too, the efforts that Ministers have made, in resistance to our contrary efforts, not to drop the mask behind which they have been hiding themselves on the most important of all questions ever since the session began. That is one of the circumstances that account for the little business that has been done, for the absurdity of speaking of the labours of the session. One cause of the congestion of business of which the right hon. Gentleman speaks, and with which he is endeavouring to cope—one main cause of that has been the constant effort of certain of his colleagues, and I am afraid I must say especially himself, to play hide and seek with Parliament and with the country. Let any of us look back, for example, upon the week that was, not wasted, but diverted from such business as the Licensing Bill to the Scottish Education Bill. I am as much interested in the Scottish Education Bill as any other Scottish Member; it is a very important Bill; but is there a man in the House who will deny that that Bill could have been quite as adequately, if not more adequately, discussed upstairs? No English Members at all, I think, appeared upon the scenes. I charge the Government with this—they come down here and try to pretend that the Parliamentary machine has broken down, that all the old traditions of Parliament in debate are outworn, and yet we know that during that week the time of the House of Commons was withdrawn from objects with which it might well have been occupied, because—it was almost admitted by imputation in an answer to the Leader of the Opposition—because hon. Gentleman opposite, and there may be some on this side, too, for aught I know, needed to have their diversions at Ascot. What a providential thing it is for us that Goodwood and St. Leger do not happen to come in the Parliamentary session.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Goodwood does.

MR. JOHN MORLEY: I fancy it does, but very late in the session. Things, I see, are less providentially arranged than I had thought. We thoroughly understand, as it is understood on the other side, what are the Prime Minister's reasons for wishing to ring the curtain down upon one of the most squalid political scenes that has ever disfigured our Parliamentary records.

As to the other point, urgency, which has been the other pillar of these guillotine closure Motions. Some reference has been made to the closure procedure upon the Evicted Tenants Bill. I certainly am not going to argue the main question of that Bill. I see the Solicitor-General opposite, and he will correct me if I am wrong. I am perfectly prepared to defend the closure Motion made upon that occasion, not on the grounds that if the Evicted Tenants Bill had not passed Ireland would have got out of hand, and that we should have had widespread and sanguinary disorder; I never said so when I was arguing for the Bill. But there was, and it was admitted by many Gentlemen on that side of the House—there was admittedly an administrative expediency in getting some remedy for the particular social condition in Ireland before the autumn and winter faced us. I will only say that my right hon. friend the Member for Monmouth did not sanction the guillotine closure till 31st July, and if we had not proposed it then, and got that measure, it is my own firm opinion even now, so far as one's opinion is worthy of value upon such a question after ten years interval—if we had not done all we could, including the guillotine closure, to press forward that Motion—that there would have been serious disorder during the coming winter. It was the very fact that we pressed forward the Bill that produced the patience and confidence that kept certain very disturbed districts quiet. In the debate on the closure Motion to that Bill the right hon. Gentleman laid down in very distinct and emphatic language the canon, and I call the attention of the House to it, by which guillotine closure ought to be governed. What were his words?

"I admit,"

said the right hon. Gentleman—

> "there may be practical necessities which have to be got over which might justify, or even compel, this House to suspend the rights which for centuries have guarded the liberty of debate. Is this Evicted Tenants Bill one of these cases? Is there some practical, menacing necessity overhanging us which if not dealt with will impair our whole social system, or the external security of the Empire?"

I am quite willing to accept that as a canon to be applied to the closure we are now discussing. Will the right hon. Gentleman get up and tell us that there is anything imperilling our whole social system or the external security of the Empire? He cannot make any such contention. We know quite well where the urgency lies, and I make no apology for putting that point. On that occasion the right hon. Gentleman said to us—

> "What do you expect to get in exchange for this sacrifice of our dignity and our honour? I will tell you. You expect to get the votes of the Irish Members. The Irish Members expect to go to their constituents and say they did their best to obtain £250,000."

We shall get off very cheaply at the present time if this Bill does not cost us more than £250,000. We know quite well what it is that you expect. I will refer to the language used by an ardent supporter of the Government. The language has been heard before, but it is very apposite on the present occasion. It is rather racier, perhaps a little more vulgar, than one likes even to repeat. This is what was said last year by the president of one of the important licensed victuallers' associations at the annual dinner—

> "I do not think the Government will go against the trade, for we put them in power, and if they treat us properly we will keep them in power, but if they do not we will chuck them out."

That is the urgency; and I confess it is painful to me, who am as jealous as other people of the honour of this House and of the honour of British government, to think that such pressure should have produced such a proposal as we are now discussing. Sir Robert Peel, when he was being hunted and harried by the protectionists—just as the protectionists, I understand, are hunting and harrying now—said—

> "I have no desire to be Minister of England, but if I am Minister of England, so long as I hold that post I will hold it by no servile tenure."

Can we imagine anyone holding by a tenure more servile than that indicated in the passage I have just read? I have no desire to lecture the right hon. Gentleman; I should be presumptuous if I did; but I cannot help recalling the four occasions prior to 1902 when the guillotine closure was applied. In the first two cases the Leader of the House, Mr. Smith, attended vigiliantly and assiduously, watched the proceedings of the House, and felt his way for a justification for his proposal. [Mr. A. J. BALFOUR dissented.] Does the right hon. Gentleman deny that?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do absolutely.

Mr. John Morley.

MR. JOHN MORLEY: I was in the House in those days, and it seemed to us on this side that Mr. Smith was constantly in the House. I certainly can speak with full authority of Mr. Gladstone's conduct on the Home Rule Bill. We could not persuade him to absent himself for more than an hour or two, and very seldom for one single hour, of those eighty-two long days.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: He had introduced the Bill; it was his Bil'.

MR. JOHN MORLEY: That is so; but as Prime Minister, as Leader of the House, he would not have felt himself in a position to move so drastic a proposal as we made in 1893 unless he had vigilantly and assiduously watched the whole proceedings in the House and the whole temper and spirit of the House.

What is the case for the application of the broad principle of which the right hon. Gentleman spoke? The House meets in February. In regard to the great Bill of the session, the proper course from his precedent would appear to be not to introduce it until the House has sat for two and a half months, not to move the Second Reading for nearly a month more, and then after three, and only three, effective Parliamentary days to come down with a thundering Motion for a guillotine closure. These are the sort of conditions which the right hon. Gentleman seems to assume justify him in making this drastic and unprecedented proposal. That is the precedent he is setting up with his great authority and great position and by his emphatic and definite language. The right hon. Gentleman's postulates and axioms mean, if they mean anything, when they are properly worked out, the abolition of the Committee stage of a Bill. Nobody in the House has had so large a share for good or for evil in legislation as the right hon. Gentleman. He must agree with me that there are many Bills in which the Committee stage is far more important really than the Second Reading stage. The workmanlike shape of a Bill, its working when it becomes law, depends much more upon the Committee stage than it does upon anything in the Second Reading stage. In his speech last Friday the Prime Minister held quite extraordinary language. He said this Licensing Bill does not contain many novel principles. I wholly dissent. It contains novel principles about the transfer of jurisdiction, about compensation, about the conditions of new licences. These proposals may be good or they may be bad, but they are novel principles. When the right hon. Gentleman says, as he did on Friday, that these principles have been thoroughly threshed out, there again I am bound to dissent from him. I do not think they have been thoroughly threshed out at all. But, be that as it may, I do not see how the right hon. Gentleman can differ from me when I say that the application of the principles of the Bill is not any less important, any less vital, than the mere formal affirmation of the principles themselves. The right hon. Gentleman says—

> "No licences are to be taken away without compensation; you have affirmed that principle, and, having done that, the best thing the House can do is to leave the rest to the draftsman and the Home Secretary."

The Home Secretary is a Gentleman of whom I will not say one single uncharitable word, but when I am asked if I will take him to be my guide in a nice discrimination among the shades of words, then I confess I am disappointed and I cannot accept that guidance. I cannot consent willingly to the doctrine that the Home Secretary and the draftsman are to supersede the Committee of the House of Commons. The right hon. Gentleman has an ingenious friend who says if we go on debating the Bill on the same scale as we have debated the first clause it will last a year and a quarter. Surely the right hon. Gentleman himself knows very well—he has had a great deal too much experience not to know—that the discussions upon the great operative, combative clauses of a Bill are certainly no test of the time that will be taken in carrying the other portions. Just look at the first clause. Apart from the question of division of jurisdiction between quarter sessions and the magistrates, there are other questions of the most supreme importance. The right hon. Gentleman said no important issue need be left undiscussed. Has he thought how many seriously important issues are left in the clause and which do need exhaustive discussion? I use the word "exhaustive" in the fair sense. Would four hours be sufficient for an exhaustive discussion on the question of liability? Yet that is all we shall have if the question comes up on a Friday. There is the question of the desirability of introducing a popular element into the local licensing authority. Many of us feel that that is a vital question, and many in the country, apart from Party politics, think that it is a vital question. Then we come to the question whether a definite reduction in proportion to population or otherwise should be made compulsory. That is another important question in which the country is profoundly interested. There is another point, not so deep as the other two, but still important — the point whether the justices are to be allowed to employ counsel, and to produce witnesses before quarter sessions, in the same way as the licensed victuallers. Surely the idea of dealing with important issues such as these raised on the first clause in six and a half hours is farcical. Look also at Clauses 2 and 3, which are to be disposed of together in six and a half hours. Listen to the opening words of Clause 2—

> "Where quarter sessions refuse the renewal of a licence under this Act, a sum equal to the difference between the value of licensed premises, calculated as if this Act had not passed—"

The Solicitor-General will agree that in these words there is material—if he were in wig and gown—for a speech for an hour's duration or more. Then we come to Clause 3, which deals with the position of the tenant of a tied house under this scheme. The right hon. Gentleman said in his speech, very cavalierly, "Oh, we have discussed the question of the tied house." But does the right hon. Gentleman see that in this third clause are raised a number of disputable questions, which cannot be answered satisfactorily except those in this House of knowledge and experience in local business are allowed to say what they have to say about them? Recollect that in the same six and a half hours are to be dealt with three Amendments put down by Gentlemen sitting on the other side of the House, the Members for East Somerset, North-west Manchester, and the University of Cambridge — Gentlemen whom we should not suspect of putting down frivolous or obstructive Amendments—which raise the vital question of gradation—that is to say, that after a certain number of years the compensation is to be less than at an early period. What fair or candid man will contend that these are Amendments which ought to be ruled out or to be discussed at the fag end of a six and a half hours discussion? It is perfectly ridiculous. Then we come to Clause 4, which is to have six and a half hours to itself. That clause sets up a completely new licensing system. I do not judge it; I am only describing it. But it undoubtedly revolutionises the whole system of licensing. The right hon. Gentleman, speaking on that point also in a very free-handed way, said—

> "The Bill embodies the principle that new licences shall only be granted under conditions which will prevent a monopoly from growing up, a most important principle upon which there is no division of opinion between the two sides of the House."

The right hon. Gentleman takes it for granted that, if there is no division of opinion between the two sides of the House, there is no occasion for discussion. Happily, the value of our discussions do not depend upon the controversial issues which are raised between the two sides of the House. This House exists to mould and shape the legislative proposals which are laid before it. And for the right hon. Gentleman to assume that upon a Bill of this kind the House of Commons, representative though it be of all parties, and full of local experience, cannot contribute anything in a full discussion to make the measure weather-tight, water-tight, is certainly the worst compliment that has ever been paid to the House. I heard the hon. and gallant Member for the Newport Division of Shropshire say on Friday that there was a concerted conspiracy on this side to prevent the fair consideration of the Bill. The hon. and gallant Gentleman has just been appointed to the Privy Council. I can only admonish him that we of the Privy Council never use random and reckless language of that kind. But no doubt he will acquire a more temperate tone of speech in that august assembly. There were able, and eloquent, and powerful speeches delivered from this side of the House on Friday, but the most pungent of all the speeches against the Motion were made on the Government side. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Cambridge University made a thoroughly well-weighted contribution to the deeper elements of the discussion. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Somerset, a supporter of the Bill, declared that if this Motion be pressed he and his friends will be unable to vote for the Third Reading. Then there is the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for North Armagh, who said he did not like the Bill, but he should vote for it for reasons that were judged to be operative in his own mind, but which were not relevant to the issue. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman said he should go into the lobby with the Ministers because he had a mandate to keep in a Unionist Government and to keep out a Separatist Government. The hon. Member for the Altrincham Division declared that it was not with a very happy conscience that he should give his vote for the Motion. The hon. Member further said—and I call the particular attention of the House to this, because I am sure that in the next Parliament the question will be taken up—"the necessity of closuring the Bill was one of the many condemnations they had had of the new Rules of Procedure." I think that is perfectly and absolutely true. If ever there was a Bill that needed to be moulded and shaped by the full discussion of this House it is the Licensing Bill. Half the social questions which interest and perplex social reformers of all shades are touched by our licensing system. Some of the deepest questions that have troubled the administration of local self-government are also touched by changes in the licensing system. If you think of the enormous interest—I might almost say the unparalleled interest—which at this moment is taken in this measure by the one side and the other on the temperance question, and by all sects, Churches, and parties, you will realise the disgust, the anger, the concern in which they will see that all those points which need minute discussion, and in which they take such deep interest, are to be shut out of the purview of the House of Commons, which is their representative Chamber, and to be settled by the draftsman and the Home Secretary.

I will only make one observation to the right hon. Gentleman, who, we all know, takes a serious and long-sighted view of the risks of democratic Government. I do not think he will differ from me when I say that no object ought to be more dear to the Legislature than that the people of the country should take an interest in the laws of the country. But if you proceed to change the spirit and the method in which the laws are made, depend upon it you will change the spirit in which the people obey the laws and revere the Parliament which makes them. It is not an accident that alongside of this Bill there is a Bill to be pressed, I understand, called the Defaulting Authorities Bill. If you persist in this line which the right hon. Gentleman foreshadows, of making laws without that full and free discussion which has given the people of this country confidence in the laws, and made the laws respected and obeyed, then you will lose that element in our national life which has made us the most law-abiding of all peoples, and given to our institutions a stability which is possessed by those of no other country. I will conclude by quoting words which the right hon. Gentleman used when we proposed the Evicted Tenants closure Motion—not that it gives me any pleasure to reproduce them, but I think they define the present situation. The right hon. Gentleman said to us sitting there—

> "Indulge in this petty and sordid trafficking for votes if you like, but do not ask us to help you to make the honour and the dignity and the traditions of this House counters in the sorry game you are playing for political support. Do not ask us to take a hand."

With those words I close my observations.

MR. JOHN REDMOND (Waterford) said that he and his hon. friends who sat with him representing Ireland in this House, intended to give a solid vote against this Resolution for closure by compartments. In taking that course they followed the unvarying record of the Irish Party. There was no section of Members in that House who had so vital an interest in maintaining the privileges of private Members as the Irish, for the reason that no matter how Governments came and went, and who sat on the Treasury Bench, the Irish Members were always anchored in opposition, a small minority, and therefore it followed that they always opposed anything tending to interfere with the privileges of private Members and the rights of minorities. On this occasion they took this action irrespective altogether of the merits and demerits of this particular Bill. On that there was a difference of opinion in the ranks of the Irish Party. In their ranks were men holding extreme views on both aspects, both as affecting the liquor traffic and temperance reform. Many years ago when Mr. Parnell founded the Nationalist Party and laid down rules for its guidance, he laid down the wise rule that on questions of this kind they should never invoke the power of the Party. He was old enough to remember when that was the rule in English Parties, and he was not sure that by that means the cause of temperance had not been advanced. With regard to these measures dealing with the liquor traffic, some had opposed and some had supported them, but the larger section had taken no part in the voting. He himself had always been in favour of the principle of compensation. More than once he had voted for it. Last year he voted in favour of the Second Reading of the Bill introduced by the hon. Member for York, and although there were portions of the present Bill he personally intensely disliked, he voted in favour of the principle of compensation on the Second Reading.

The question of closure by compartments, however, should not be looked at from the narrow point of view of the merits or demerits of the Bill. The Motion had not been proposed as a desperate expedient to meet a desperate crisis in the conduct of the affairs of the House. On the contrary, the Prime Minister put it forward as a great principle and a great precedent to be followed in the conduct of the ordinary business of the House in future, and this, to his mind, differentiated the present proposal from any similar Motion ever before the House. In 1887, when closure by compartments was proposed on the Coercion Bill, the Bill had been fifteen days in Committee, and it was notorious that there was an open declaration by Members for Nationalist constituencies that they would exercise every form of the House to prevent the Bill being passed. On the other hand, the Government claimed that the passage of the Bill was necessary to protect life and property, and secure law and order in Ireland. On the Home Rule Bill of 1893 a similar state of things arose The Bill had been twenty-eight days in Committee, and was opposed by a strong and powerful Opposition, who declared openly that they would exercise every device in their power to prevent its passing. So two years ago on the Education Bill, the Bill had been twenty-eight days in Committee,and there was an Opposition which did not disguise the fact that it intended to use every possible means to defeat the measure. Could it be honestly said that there were now, as then, special circumstances justifying a desperate and special expedient? The real facts were notorious. On several occasions, when the House was ready for a division the Government Whips had put up speakers to postpone a division until their supporters had arrived, [OPPOSITION cheers.] If the Prime Minister could have come to the House, as the Leader of the House on former occasions, and have been able to say, "We have done our best; but here is a Bill which has been obstructed in such a way and so long that unless you allow us to take some extraordinary remedy the will of the majority will be absolutely set at nought by the minority," then there might have been something to say for the Resolution, though its form would still be open to great objection. But the Prime Minister made no such demand. His argument all through his speech was that under the existing system no great measure introduced by any Government, if vigorously opposed, could be passed into law without some such device as closure by compartments. That argument entirely changed the whole character of his demand. They were asked to create a new precedent which would be put into force for all time in the House, namely, to declare that where there were no exceptional circumstances or difficulties, where there was no obstruction, and no crisis, abstract powers should be put in force to close discussion on a measure of the most far-reaching importance.

The Prime Minister stated that under the present system of transacting business there was a very gloomy future before the House of Commons, and that there were only two alternatives, viz., absolute impotence and closure by compartments. Surely such a prospect ought to give pause to every believer in Parliamentary institutions. If the country once came to the conclusion that the House was impotent, that it was unable to transact the legislation brought before it, or to supply an effective check by discussion and had degenerated into a mere talking shop, the House of Commons would receive and would deserve the contempt of the people. It would not occupy a much better position in the eyes of the people and the country generally if it were proved that the only way in which any Government could in the future pass a great measure was by putting a stop to deliberation and suppressing free speech. If it became a regular practice, the House would have ceased to be a deliberative Assembly, and would merely register the decrees of a small number of gentlemen called a Cabinet. The whole raison d'être of the Assembly would have disappeared, and that alternative would be just as fatal to the survival of representative and Parliamentary institutions in this country as the other alternative of impotence to which the Prime Minister had alluded. There was a possibility only hinted at by the right hon. Gentleman of some great statesman in the future being able so to arrange the rules of the House that it would be able to transact its business. But no new Rules of Procedure would cure the disease from which the House was suffering. Since the year 1832 there had been eighteen Committees of the House of Commons deliberating upon new Rules. Again and again reforms had been introduced to facilitate the business of the House, and yet year by year the difficulties had been increasing. In 1902 they had a brand new code of Rules brought in by the right hon. Gentleman himself for the purpose of facilitating business. The House should recollect the circumstances under which those Rules were introduced. They were brought in by probably one of the ablest statesmen England had ever seen, who was surrounded by a galaxy of talent, backed by an unexampled majority, and possessing absolute powers to carry any proposals he chose to bring forward. After mature deliberation a series of new Rules were introduced which, in the words of the Prime Minister—

> "Would leave this House . . . not merely as a machine for passing legislation, but a free arena in which questions interesting to the country may be discussed."

And now, after two years' experience, the right hon. Gentleman told the House there were only two alternatives before them—one of absolute impotence and the other closure by compartments.

But a far more serious consideration than the effect of this Motion upon this or that measure was the future of the House of Commons as a deliberative and legislative Assembly. It was amazing to him that he had not heard any speaker go to the root of the matter. The House was attempting an impossible task—a task day by day becoming more impossible under the new conditions that had arisen owing to a variety of causes. It was physically impossible that one legislative Assembly, even if it sat every day in the year, could fulfil the duties of a great Imperial Senate and also the duties of half-a-dozen local Parliaments as well. It was perfectly true that his argument on these procedure questions was always the same, but every session's experience demonstrated the truth and increased the force of his contention. He was not now arguing for Home Rule for Ireland, that question rested upon an entirely different set of considerations; he was trying in all seriousness of spirit to look at the question from the point of view of the House, of a Member of the House of Commons, and of a man who was a believer in Parliamentary institutions, and in all seriousness he declared that the Government were subjecting Parliamentary institutions to a strain they could not stand, and under which they would completely break down if the present course were persisted in. The more coercive proceedings of this kind were proposed, the more they would have to be increased. No more humiliating confession of the breakdown of the Parliamentary machine could have been made than that of the Prime Minister, viz., impotence or the "gag." The closure when first proposed was put forward as a device which would be used only in exceptional circumstances; it was a strong and drastic medicine to be applied only in cases of grave disorder; it had now become a part of the ordinary everyday diet of the House of Commons. So it would be with closure by compartments. For the first time, the House was being asked to adopt this procedure, not to ease the dangers of a special situation, but on general principles to enable the Government to carry a great measure in the face of a vigorous Opposition. In a comparatively short space of time the House would find closure by compartments a part of its ordinary everyday procedure.

Not only the possibility, but the absolute absurdity of the present system was self-evident. The House of Commons was the great Senate of the Empire, governing great Imperial interests of hundreds of millions of people in different parts of the world—an Assembly whose time ought to be devoted to the consideration of questions upon which, perhaps, the peace of the world or the interests of humanity depended; and it was at the same time the local Parliament of England, Scotland, Wales, and Ireland, charged with the duty of legislating for and supervising the administration of the smallest local and comparatively insignificant affairs of each portion of the so-called United Kingdom. The result was lamentable, but it was also ludicrous. At one moment this great Imperial Senate was called upon to discuss questions of Imperial importance affecting the whole Empire, and sometimes the whole civilised world; and then, suddenly, those questions were automatically hung up in order that the same Imperial Senate might discuss the dismissal of a policeman in Ireland or the alleged interference with St. Winifred's Well in Wales. The other day he was visited by a distinguished official from one of the most distant parts of the Empire. This gentleman had been absent from England for many years, and returned filled with the proudest thoughts of the greatness of the Empire. Never having heard a debate in the House of Commons, he asked him (the hon. and learned Member) to secure him a place under the gallery. He entered the House with feelings almost of reverential awe, and then to his amazement he heard the House discussing for an hour and a half how best to deal with bugs and fleas in tenement houses. The position was absolutely ludicrous; it was also very serious. The latest edition of the Rules of Procedure were admitted by this Resolution to have been an absolute failure, and the closure by compartments would degrade, humiliate, and finally destroy. The House of Commons was being gradually suffocated and strangled to death, its only hope was to follow the example of other great nations similarly circumstanced by making a distinction between Imperial and local concerns, and thus affording time for the efficient government of both.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I will not repeat the criticism which I have previously passed upon some of the interventions in our constitutional debates by the hon. Member, for he has referred to that criticism in a very good-humoured spirit; and as to the contention which he has advanced to-day, I do not at all traverse one of the main pillars upon which he has built his thesis—namely, that this House does devote too much time to the details of measures, and thereby to a certain extent loses the sense of proportion and has not enough time to consider the principles of measures. I will point out to the hon. Member that he is in absolute disagreement with an eminent statesman who agrees with him on the subject of Home Rule in advancing that proposition, for the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose complains—he did not pretend, he could not pretend, that any great principle underlying this Bill was undiscussed—what he said was that in order to make it a workable measure, in order that it might really carry out the intentions of its framers and of the House, it was necessary that the details should be hammered out on the floor of the House. It is no great interest of mine to knock together the heads of two such eminent persons who evidently, although they are going to vote on the same side, approach this matter from an entirely different standpoint, Home Rulers though they both be. The hon. Gentleman in his defence of the British Constitution seems to me to have forgotten facts in the historic career of himself and the Party which he leads because he told us, unless I entirely misunderstood his meaning, that he had always opposed Motions of this kind.

Mr. JOHN REDMOND: No. I said the the Irish Party had invariably cast their votes against interference with freedom of speech and the rights of private Members of this House. I believe that statement is quite accurate.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not wish to put into the hon. Gentleman's words any meaning which he did not intend to put into them himself. But surely he meant the House to understand that closure by compartments was an interference with the freedom of speech and the rights of the House, and so neither he nor his friends could support it; nor had they been found to support it in the past. The hon. Gentleman has forgotten what has taken place. To begin with, he did not vote against the closure by compartments on the Education Bill two years ago.

Mr. JOHN REDMOND: I was not here; I was in America.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: None of his friends did. In the second place, he did vote for the closure by compartments both of the Home Rule Bill and of the Evicted Tenants Bill. I quite understand. I do not complain. The hon. Gentleman, in pursuance of what, no doubt, are perfectly legitimate tactics, desires to support the Opposition in this particular controversy. But do not let him come down to the House and, with an air of Roman virtue, declare that now he is merely carrying out a policy pursued in fair weather and in rainy weather alike by himself and his friends throughout a long period of Parliamentary history. If he goes back to the records of this House he will find that no such case can be made out.

I am sorry that the course which this debate has taken will compel me, in the few minutes which I shall occupy in the reply which courtesy to the House requires me to make, to deal with some accusations which are of a more or less personal character, and are rather on one side of the important proposition which we are asked to discuss to-day. The right hon. Gentleman who opened the debate this afternoon, in a speech of great courtesy, attacked me in a manner which I do not complain of for not having been present all through the debates in Committee on this Bill, his view being that my absence from some of these debates in Committee disqualified me for forming an opinion of the propriety or impropriety of the steps I am now asking the House to adopt. Well, Sir, it is perfectly true that this Bill is not under my personal conduct. As the right hon. Gentleman says, I believe, for good or for evil, I have personally conducted more important measures through this House than any Member of it now living, and the House will admit, I think, that I have never shrunk from the labour of detail which that responsibility throws upon me. But I do not believe that it is in accordance with precedent or in the best interests of this House that it should be understood as a matter of course that the Leader of the House for the time being is to be responsible for all its important Bills. The right hon. Gentleman alluded to my lamented friend Mr. Smith, and said he was present throughout the debates on the Crimes Act. Sir, he was rarely present; he entrusted to me the whole responsibility for the conduct of that measure, and I do not think he thought it necessary to sit through the debates. May I be permitted to make this further addition to what I have said on this subject? Some Members of the House seem to be of opinion that it is in pursuit of some personal leisure that I am absent from this Bench. I can only say that the moments of greatest repose which I have in the course of a somewhat laborious official career are the moments I spend on this Bench. It may not be agreeable to listen to a series of tirades directed either against myself or against the policy of the Government, but it is not fatiguing. If I am not present upon this Bench, I can assure the House that I am invariably engaged in matters which, if not of more importance, at all events involve much greater personal labour and exertion. Even as regards this Bill, I may say that I made a speech on the First Reading of it, that I made a speech on the Second Reading, and that I have intervened once or twice while it has been in Committee, and those interventions have been objected to by hon. Gentlemen opposite. Nobody can say I have left this Bill severely alone in the sense, for instance, in which Mr. Smith left to me the sole conduct of the Crimes Act and other large measures of Irish legislation with which, while he was Leader, I was entrusted.

That is perhaps a small matter. But I am afraid there is one other personal point which I cannot leave wholly alone. I have not been merely accused of leaving this Bill without sufficient superintendence, I have been accused, in perfectly unmistakable language, of having had my judgment as regards this Bill entirely perverted by the society which, according to the hon. Member for Spen Valley Division, I have been accustomed to keep. He refers, I understand, to the two or three days in the year which I am sorry to say are all, while in office, that I have been able to give to my constituency. But that minute fragment of the year, according to the hon. Gentleman's judgment, has been enough to corrupt at its source any estimate which I am able to frame upon a question in which licence-holders or brewers may be concerned. Well, Sir, I do not know that the hon. Member's estimate of my judgment is a matter on which I need detain the House, but I deeply regret that he should have thought it desirable in his interests or in anybody's interests to make a personal attack upon me which involved the reputations of two other persons, one of whom has long been dead, and the other of whom is in no sense open to the insinuation or suggestion which the hon. Gentleman, taking advantage of his position in this House, has made against him. He has chosen to attack my present chairman. My present chairman has never made any observation to me directly or indirectly upon this Bill or upon any other question of Governmental policy. But, in any case, as far as I am aware, his interests are no more affected by this Bill than the interests of the chairman of the hon. Gentleman himself, and I assume that the chairman of the hon. Gentleman is neither a brewer nor a licence-holder. And I must say the case is far worse with reference to the suggestion made by the hon. Member in regard to one who was many years ago my chairman and who was a brewer.

MR. WHITTAKER (Yorkshire, W.R., Spen Valley): I made no reference to him.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman talked of scandals in my constituency, which can only be interpreted as having reference to a story of which I just heard——

MR. WHITTAKER: I was making no reference to that gentleman. I was referring to the scandals in Manchester—the well-known scandals in connection with the watch committee, of which Sir John Marks was chairman, and the police. That is why I referred to the chief constable. I am afraid the right hon. Gentleman does not know of them.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I admit I do not closely follow municipal affairs, which have nothing to do with my connection with Manchester.

MR. WHITTAKER: A national scandal.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If the hon. Gentleman wishes to attack the Corporation of Manchester or any member of it he is at liberty to do so, but do not let him associate me with matters of that kind. The sincerity of the hon. Gentleman is beyond doubt; of his charity I have seen but few fragments. I think it would be well, I will not say for him, but for his cause, if he could persuade the House or anybody else that what animates him in this matter is not a personal aversion to a trade or to a class, but a desire to carry out that which this Bill will undoubtedly carry out—namely, a great temperance reform. The hon. Gentleman says that we are the slaves of a trade. May I point out to him and to the House that we do conceive that this measure, in addition to all that we have a right to hope from it in the direction of temperance reform, does, in our opinion, do justice to a trade? We have never disguised that, and we believe it; and, what is more, that has been part of the creed of the vast majority of the Gentlemen sitting on this side of the House. If it be true that we are doing justice to a particular trade, are we disgraced because that trade expresses its desire to see that justice done to it? Can anything be more childish than to suppose that because the licence-holder desires to see this Bill pass—— [OPPOSITION] cries of "The brewer.") We will not quarrel. The licence-holder, the brewer, the holders of brewery shares, the insurance companies who hold brewery shares, in which, I daresay, the hon. Gentleman has insured his life—they may all be protected from injustice by this Bill; and why should they not say so, and what disgrace is there if we, holding the view that we are doing them a benefit, should accept these over-statements of their gratitude? The hon. Gentleman talked of our coming to "the crack of the whip." I suppose he meant the votes which this Bill is expected to give to the present holders of office. That sporting metaphor is capable of extension. I could not help looking at the face of the hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Irish Party while the hon. Member for the Spen Valley was speaking, and I thought I saw a faint smile cross his face, probably produced by a reminiscence of the Evicted Tenants Bill, to which I shall refer in a moment, and I thought that, after all, perhaps "the crack of the whip" had been heard before in other quarters. And in a moment of unaccustomed prophecy I looked forward and I thought it not impossible that from the same quarter, and adjusted to the same victims, "the crack of the whip" might be heard at no distant date. [Cheers and some OPPOSITION cries of "When?"] Well, whenever the followers of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Waterford are in the position they were in between the years 1893 and 1895. I do not know that that position will recur, but I think it may; and then the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Spen Valley will have ample experience in illustration of the constitutional position which at present gives him such acute pain.

I turn from the hon. Member for Spen Valley to the defenders of the Constitution—the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Fife, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose. I think they can hardly have examined or refreshed their memory with anything connected with the previous incidents which are parallel to this occasion except in giving a most devoted study to the speeches I have made on these occasions. I accuse them of no neglect in that respect, but in every other respect they have really fallen into blunder after blunder. Some of these blunders I will venture to bring to the notice of the House. In the first place the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose has told us that I am the first person and that this is the first occasion on which any such measure has been proposed without making obstruction the chief argument in favour of it. That is a complete delusion. I have not looked up my own speeches on the Education Bill, but I have looked through Mr. Gladstone's speech on the Home Rule Bill and the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Monmouth, who moved a corresponding Motion to this on the Evicted Tenants Bill, and neither of those statesmen made any nearer reference to obstruction than I have made myself. I pointed out that if progress was to be at this rate the Bill would never be finished. I pointed out, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Monmouth pointed out, that the number of Amendments on the Paper was such that it was incredible that in any reasonable time we should be able to dispose of them. The only difference between us was that, while the right hon. Gentleman opposite appealed to twenty-two pages of Amendments, it was my privilege to appeal to sixty-five pages of Amendments. In other words, I had an argument precisely three times as strong as he was able to produce. So much for the first point.

The next accusation made against me, also by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose, is that I have devised an entirely new principle to justify this violation of the liberties of the House. I have not put it, he says, on obstruction, but I have put it on the general principle that the House cannot conduct its business if it is required to sit during the length of time which evidently would be required were this Bill to follow its natural course. I agree that that was my main argument, and I also admit that when I used it I was not conscious that I was guilty of plagiarism. But it has been since pointed out to me that precisely that argument, almost in my words, was used by Mr. Gladstone on a precisely similar occasion—that is to say, on the closure of the Home Rule Bill on the 29th of June, 1893. Mr. Gladstone said—

> "We are compelled, by the arrangement of our finances, to regulate our Parliamentary proceedings by the revolution of the year. But, the year containing twelve months, it is obviously impossible for the Members of this House to devote the whole of those twelve months to the direct discharge of their public duties within these walls. The common practice of Parliament has been for the last sixty years, since the passing of the first Reform Act, to devote six months, or perhaps seven months, to the discharge of those duties; and, in assigning to them so large a portion of the year, I believe I may correctly say Parliament has gone beyond what has ever been attempted—beyond what has ever been done by any other deliberative Assembly in the world."

That is precisely the general argument which I have used to the House. So much for the new principle which the right hon. Gentleman, far above my merits, credits me with having discovered in defence of the present proposal. But let us go a little closer into this matter. The three defenders of the Constitution to whom I have referred were all responsible both for the closure by compartments on the Home Rule Bill and for the closure by compartments upon the Evicted Tenants Bill. The two charges made against this proceeding are, in the first place, that we are putting on the closure too quickly, and the other is that the closure we desire to put on will exclude the discussion of very important questions; the compartments are too small. I will examine both these propositions in the light of precedent in which the right hon. Gentleman took a leading part. As regards the length of time during which the discussion has gone on, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Fife talked about x days as having been spent in Committee; but the time taken in the Committee on the Evicted Tenants Bill was only two days. What is the reply to that? The reply made by the other side is that the Evicted Tenants Bill stood by itself, that it was a great measure of public order; and that if it had not been carried through this House, if further delay had been allowed, there would have been crime in the winter and agrarian disorganisation in Ireland for many months. So flimsy a pretext has never, I think, been seriously advanced in this House by responsible statesmen. Let me remind them of some of the dates. They came into office in 1892, but the claims of social order in Ireland are not attempted to be dealt with until 1894. That is nearly three years.

Mr. JOHN MORLEY: I would remind the right hon. Gentleman that a Commission was appointed.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I thought the right hon. Gentleman would remind me of that Commission. It is perfectly true that the right hon. Gentleman and his friends appointed a Commission. It sat and it reported in the spring of 1893—let the House mark the date—while the Home Rule Bill was going on; and I presume it was on the Report of that Commission that the right hon. Gentleman and his friends thought this was a pressing question in connection with public order in Ireland. I do not blame them, even in the interests of public order in Ireland, for not interrupting the discussions on the Home Rule Bill to carry out the Report of the Commission. But what did they do when the Home Rule Bill was kicked out by the House of Lords? Did they then go on with the Evicted Tenants Bill, which was desired so urgently to preserve law and order in Ireland? Not at all. They occupied six months more of the session—we sat, as the House remembers, to a date in the following year—with the English Parish Councils Bill and other matters, no doubt of considerable parochial importance, but matters which no one can pretend ought to stand in the way of a measure which was really required to preserve law and order in Ireland. That brings me to 1894. And then what did they do about this measure required for law and order in Ireland? We have been told that we have shown an iniquitous disregard for the interests of the House because we only introduced the Licensing Bill on 20th April of this year. I admit that they have the better of us there by fully twenty-four hours, because their Bill for preserving law and order in Ireland was introduced on 19th April. But though we cannot compete with them as to the date of introduction, we really can compete with them as to the ardour and the urgency with which we pursued our policy. We have been reproached on that subject also. We have been told that the House had almost forgotten where they left off with the Licensing Bill, so great was the delay that occurred between the introduction and the later stages of it. We are only now in the very first days of July. When does the House think this urgent measure of law and order, introduced on 19th April was read a second time? Exactly three months after its introduction. Law and order in Ireland had to wait for Welsh Disestablishment, the death duties, and other matters, no doubt of great importance, but of less importance than law and order in Ireland, which had to wait for these three months. And yet we are seriously told that a Bill which was only read a second time on 20th July, some months after the Commission reported, was of such an urgent character that after two days in Committee the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Monmouth was justified in coming down and in a speech which in Hansard takes up, I think, a column, and in which law and order does not appear any more than obstruction, or if it appears, scarcely appears—we are told that closure by compartment was absolutely necessary. No, Sir, it was the crack of that whip of which we have heard so much, which produced this immediate necessity for dealing with law and order which would no longer wait, and for which the liberties of debate and the dignity of this House were so readily sacrificed by such ardent supporters of the British Constitution as the Member for Waterford and his friends. So much for the first count in the indictment, which says that we have introduced this closure too early in the proceedings.

Now we come to the second count, and I venture to think a much more important count, in the indictment, which says that our compartments are so contrived that nothing like adequate discussion can be found for the questions that remain. [OPPOSITION cheers.] I am surprised after the little historical disquisition I have given to the House that that should be cheered by hon. Gentlemen opposite. I am not going through, compartment by compartment, the arrangements made by Mr. Gladstone and the three defenders of the Constitution with regard to the Home Rule Bill, but I will take one compartment as a specimen. It is the week-long compartment, which comprised five Parliamentary days, and was concluded on 13th July. In those five days eighteen clauses were to be discussed; an average of three or three-and-a-quarter a day. What were those clauses? Did they consist of those details which the right hon. Member for Montrose think ought to be so carefully smoothed out, and made watertight and practicable on the floor of the House? I will tell the House what they contained. The first one dealt with the absolutely vital question as to whether the Irish Members in this House were or were not to be allowed to vote upon questions which affected only England, Scotland, or Wales, perhaps the most crucial point in the whole Bill. During the course of those five days, in fact I think on the last day but one of the five—and this was the first of eighteen clauses to be embraced in the five days—on the penultimate day of that compartment, it seems almost incredible, but it is the fact, Mr. Gladstone came down and told the House, "We have entirely altered the plan of this Bill." He told the House that, whereas his original idea, the idea which we had discussed for four days, had been to have the Irish Members in this House only for purposes in which Ireland was concerned, he had come to the conclusion after four days debate that they must be included for all purposes. And when he made that declaration there was only one day remaining in the compartment, so we literally had to decide this, which was not detail but a fundamental constitutional principle, under closure in the last day of the compartment. That is not nearly all, because there remained the seventeen other clauses. And what did these seventeen clauses deal with? Details comparable to Clause 3 in this Bill? They dealt with the whole complicated financial proposals of the Bill with regard to the Consolidated Fund, the hereditary revenues, the financial arrangements between Great Britain and Ireland, and with regard to the Irish Consolidated Fund, the local taxation accounts, and money Bills. I do not think I have finished the enumeration, but I think I have said enough. Where were the defenders of the Constitution when that was done? Where was the Member for Wolverhampton, the Member for East Fife, the Member for Montrose?

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): What did you say to it?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I was on that side of the House. They were cheering on their great Leader; that was their notion of closure by compartments, that was the length of time they thought ought to be given to the details of a Bill. And then they actually come down here and tell us, the very men who thought two days in Committee a sufficient allowance in the case of the Evicted Tenants Bill before closure by compartment was moved, and a compartment of five days long enough in which to discuss eighteen clauses of the character which I have described—these men come down, and, with an indignation which I will not say is mock, but which surely is founded upon a most convenient forgetfulness, they accuse us of having gone too far in this matter. I have been taunted, almost, with not accusing hon. Gentlemen of obstruction. Well, I do not mean to accuse them of obstruction now. They may take it as an accusation or not as they please, I will state a fact which I do not believe a single one of them will deny. It is this — were the House to accept this Amendment, and were the House thereupon to plunge into the sixty-five pages of Amendments already upon the Paper, which, as I said on Friday, are probably mere rude and inadequate sketches of the changes that would be proposed if we went on as we are doing now, I do state as a fact that the Parliamentary machine would break down. I do not believe there is a single man on the other side of the House who doubts it. [OPPOSITION cries of "Oh!"] I go the length, not of saying that they desire in the abstract that the Parliamentary machine should break down, but that they do emphatically desire that it should break down while we have the management of it; they all know it; it is common talk. If it were not common talk, you have only got to look at the Order Paper, and you can see that it is true. And are we to be debarred from taking a proceeding which, compared with what they have done in the past, sinks into absolute insignificance because they are of opinion that the Parliamentary liberties, which have survived the action of Mr. Gladstone on the Home Rule Bill, and have survived the action of the Member for Monmouth on the Evicted Tenants Bill, are now imperilled by the modest proposals we are making? [OPPOSITION cries of "Oh!"] Perhaps not modest absolutely, modest relatively, modest as compared with what a greater generation than we have attempted and carried successfully against resistance. I do not think the contention would stand for a moment. The truth is that if the House decided not to pass this Motion, they will do nothing for their own liberties. The precedents that those Gentlemen, when they come into office, will look back on, are not our precedents on this Bill, they are their own precedents on other Bills. What you would do would be to destroy the chances of the passage of a Bill which I believe in my heart and conscience is going, not only to do justice to a trade, but is going to do more for temperance reform in this country not merely than anything which hon. Gentlemen opposite have done, for they have done nothing in twenty years, but more than anything which their proposals, or any proposals of theirs with which I am acquainted, could have effected if carried into law. I therefore hope that, not merely in the interests of what to me appear the true interests of this great legislative Assembly, but in the interests also of the particular Bill with which we are concerned, the House will, by an overwhelming majority, support us in the action we are taking.

Mr. A. J. Balfour.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon Boroughs) said that the Prime Minister, in making his interesting comparison anent the Home Rule Bill and the Evicted Tenants Bill and this Bill had forgotten the sequel to the Home Rules Bill. That Bill, too, was eighty-foure days in Committee, ten times as long as the right hon. Gentleman proposed to give to the present measure, although he did not think anyone would say that the Home Rule question was ten times more important than the temperance question to the country. The sequel was that the Home Rule Bill, very largely because of the compartment closure, was thrown out by the House of Lords; an appeal was then made to the country, and the country took the same view as had the Opposition of that day. That was a story of some significance for the right hon. Gentleman. With regard to the Evicted Tenants Bill, his withers were unwrung, for he agreed with the then Opposition and did not himself vote for the closure Motion, thinking it a great mistake and a dangerous precedent which trenched on the liberties of Parliament, and what happened afterwards justified his action. He agreed that each case must be taken on its merits. But in the case of the Evicted Tenants Bill, a proposal merely to spend £250,000—wisely or unwisely—upon the settlement of a vexed question in Ireland was not to be compared for one moment in matter and magnitude to the proposals in the Bill introduced by the right hon. Gentleman.

Take each case, said the right hon. Gentleman, on its merits; but had the right hon. Gentleman taken the present case on its merits? What he had done was to evolve a fantastic theory about the allocation of Parliamentary time. It was a most preposterous theory that legislation must go through without criticism. The Home Rule Bill had been discussed in the country for six years, and came before the House as the result of a mandate. What about the present proposals? The right hon. Gentleman rather scoffed at a mandate. He would not argue that the House of Commons had no right to pass any Bill unless the subject matter had been the subject of consideration before the House was elected. That was not the point here. The point here was not a constitutional point, but a point of honour. If the leaders of a Party went to the country and said to the electors, "You are asked to settle one question, and you are not asked to express any opinion on other questions," deliberately, with a view to procuring the votes of men who disagreed with them, it might not be a breach of the Constitution to break that pledge, but every man of honour would respect it. If before a general election the country had been thrashing out all the objections to a question, and then came to the conclusion that despite the difficulties which existed it would try the experiment, and if the Opposition afterwards proceeded to raise the same criticisms ad infinitum, with a view to destroying the Bill, surely, in that case the decision of the country would be an element in considering the amount of time to be given to the discussion. But in this case the question was not considered; it was brushed aside. More than that. Whenever proposals of this character were advanced in previous Parliaments the protest in the country was so strong that the Government of the day were obliged to respect the feelings of the country and drop their proposals. Yet, these proposals were introduced now merely as a result of pressure from a section of the right hon. Gentleman's own Party. That was the condition of the matter.

There was another ground on which the guillotine might be introduced and that was the ground of emergency. He would not deal with that. He had voted for the guillotine before, and might vote for it again; but it was nevertheless a crude and barbarous method of dealing with a difficulty which, he agreed with the hon. Member for Waterford, could never be dealt with until they had devolved matters of detail on local assemblies. As long, however, as this Parliament decided to retain all matters great and small there must be something of the kind. But they should consider the importance and difficulty of the question to be dealt with. There was no question more important or more difficult; or no question with reference to which a blunder would more seriously affect the well-being of the people than the question of temperance legislation. It affected millions of households; touched the habits of the people; and it was a question which had brought misery and ruin to hundreds and thousands of homes. What question could Parliament consider better than that? The right hon. Gentleman referred to the evils connected with the Beerhouses Act of 1869; but that Act was passed without consideration, and in a moment of hurry. That Act had brought untold evils on the country and surely that should be a warning to them. Had the Government considered this question candidly and sincerely on its merits, or had they been animated by other considerations? Had they considered it from the point of view of Party difficulties, and with a view of prolonging their own official life? If they had, such a thing would be an act of treason to the free institutions of this country. What was the position? The Prime Minister, when he introduced the Motion, proved that he had not really considered the whole of his own Bill in relation to this Motion. He enumerated four questions which had, he said, already been adopted in Committee. They were the basis of compensation, tied houses, and time limit, and new licences. Two out of those questions had never even been reached, and yet the right hon. Gentleman did not know it.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think the hon. Member has misquoted me.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE said he was certain he had not. The right hon. Gentleman said those questions had already been debated.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I was perfectly aware that Clause 4 is the clause which deals with future licences, and of course we have not reached that; but it has been referred to and the general principle of it. I thought it was a matter of common agreement.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE said that the question was whether it had been debated and surely that was most important. His hon. friend the Member for the Spen Valley had stated the case very moderately when he said that Clauses 2 and 3 were to receive half a day each. They had three and a quarter hours for each clause. The cardinal questions inside the two clauses which must still be debated, were the question that it should be left to the discretion of the justices to decide the compensation, the basis of compensation, the question of whether retail or wholesale profits should come into the computation (a provision affecting 85 per cent. of the public-houses in the country and which would double the amount of compensation)—the question of who was to receive the compensation, the question of what proportion, the question of who was to make the valuation, and the question raised by the hon. Member for the Brightside Division. Surely they must get a division on these questions, because it was right that the country should know how every Member voted upon those questions. That left one and three quarter hours to debate seven cardinal propositions, about fifteen minutes to each proposition, surely that was reducing the House of Commons to a perfect farce as far as discussion was concerned. But they all knew why it was done. The discussion about the division between the brewer and the publican came at the end of the clause when it could not now be raised. It was a question which the Government did not want discussed, naturally. But the Government had not considered it from that point of view, they were simply looking at the Parliamentary situation. The Prime Minister had to drop the Budget. He came back to the brewers, and there was a little bit of sugar in that so it fermented a little. There was a contrast between last week and this week. When the Budget was on the business was "flat, stale, and unprofitable," but last week they were fermenting in the brewers' mash tub. They had lost the confidence of the country. The one question the country was interested in at the present moment was when the Government was going to take its "off-licence." By-election after by-election had gone against them in spite of every effort and every manœuvre. They actually threw over the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham as a sort of Jonah to pacify the storm, but still the waves were just as high. That was what the Standard said. The Standard was of opinion that they had not drowned him but merely ducked him, and that he was still lurking somewhere near the steering gear, but still the storm was raging. They had the country against them and they were merely keeping things going until something cropped up and they could put their fiscal reform scheme upon the market. The market was depressed. In the language of the Stock Exchange protection had weakened in sympathy with slavery. Because the country had no confidence in the Government, the representatives of the country in this House were to lose their right to criticise this measure. That was the real position.

Mr. Lloyd-George.

If the right hon. Gentleman had a Parliamentary majority in which he had confidence this was not a thing that he would propose to the House of Commons. It was because he had no confidence in them that he was going to force this Bill through without giving the House an opportunity of properly considering it. It was because the Government had made up their minds to stick to office through thick and thin. The right hon. Gentleman had been very hard on those whose weakness was drunkenness, but he ought to be a little more tender to the weaknesses of human nature. They did not all lie in the same direction. With some it was drunkenness; with others it was office. But it was the business of the House to closely watch these things. This House had to see that things of this sort were not done to create evil precedents; to rush through Bills monstrous in themselves, without the House of Commons holding a firm grasp on them and doing something in order to improve them by way of Amendments. What was the urgency for this? It could not be the Budget, because there was not very much of that left. Was it the Army? There was no hurry there at all. The right hon. Gentleman was putting it through from time to time. He had a mandate there. The country expected him to deal with it; the War Minister said it was the most urgent problem of the moment, but the right hon. Gentleman, the head of the Defence Committee—a Committee charged with the defence of the Empire—who had been heralded as the greatest strategist since the Duke of Wellington, said there was no hurry, and he had laid aside the sword in order to turn the spigot. It was not the Army. Then it must be the Welsh Coercion Bill. The right hon. Gentleman said there were two contentious measures they must push forward this session, this and the Welsh Coercion Bill, or the Defaulting Authorities Bill as it was called. What was the urgency there? Again, the urgency there was not a social but a political one—a Party one. The Bishops were in arms against the Licensing Bill, and the Prime Minister gently hinted that he had a spiteful little Bill against the Welsh Nonconformists which he would give to them if they were good boys. They had all come to the conclusion that this was a pernicious Bill, greatly affecting the material and moral welfare of their flock. But the Prime Minister said, "Never mind"—that he would give them something in return; that he would hand over the Welsh county councils to them. The whole thing was tainted with corruption from the beginning to end. When the Prime Minister replied to the charge of the hon. Member for the Spen Valley that he was coming to heel at the crack of the whip, he did not deny it.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do deny it.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: The right hon. Gentleman denied that, but not in a very enthusiastic way, with his eyes closed. How could he deny it? When did he first say he was going to bring in a Bill of some sort? After the Rye and Woolwich elections; after the brewers had said, to quote the words of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose, "You have got to do it, or we will chuck you out." It was the policy of retaliation. That was no doubt where the right hon. Gentleman got his idea of the big revolver. This was purely and simply a matter of bribery and corruption. The Bill was not brought forward in the public interest, or because it was of great social urgency. It was considered as a property—as a matter of electioneering. The Prime Minister said to himself, "I may have offended every man who would like to see the business of the country transacted in an efficient way; I may have alienated all those who do not like to see the resources of the country squandered; I may have hurt the consciences of those who at any rate like a policy to be put in straightforward language; I may have alienated all the moral forces of the land by a Bill of this sort. But in time to come I shall have one friend by me, and my Government will stagger to the polls arm in arm with the assistance of the trade"—a trade which, in the opinion of the great Judges of the land, had filled our gaols with criminals and our asylums with lunatics, and which, in the opinion of every expert in social reform, had increased and deepened the degradation and distress of hundreds and thousands of the people.

MR. MIDDLEMORE (Birmingham, N.) said the Prime Minister's proposal had placed some of the moderate temperance men who occupied seats behind the right hon. Gentleman in a position of considerable difficulty, and they were in doubt whether upon this question they could support the Government. They thought the Motion for closure was premature; and that there were matters in the Bill which required, but would be excluded from, discussion; and, finally, in view of the treatment which the right hon. Baronet the Member for Devonshire and some of his supporters—of whom he was one—received last Wednesday, he thought they had a right to enter a protest. As to the treatment of which he had spoken, he recalled that on Wednesday the Solicitor-General explained certain words in the first clause of the Bill, and if his exposition was correct, the right hon. Gentleman carried with him the sentiment of almost everyone on the Government side of the House, and of a very large number of Members of the Opposition. But there arose a difference of opinion upon the point among many high legal authorities, and it was alleged that the Courts of Law would put a different construction to that which the Solicitor-General placed upon the clause unless its wording were amended.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is hardly in order in discussing a particular Amendment.

MR. MIDDLEMORE: I was anxious to explain my position, Mr. Speaker, and if you will allow me to say one word more, and only one, I think it could be done. After the Solicitor-General had consented to amend the phraseology, the Prime Minister declined to accept any Amendment, and many hon. Members felt that they were unreasonably dealt with by such action.

*MR. SPEAKER again intervened.

MR. MIDDLEMORE expressed regret that he had erred so much, and said he would not refer again to the topic which had been ruled out of order. There was a question of confiscation—confiscation of the rights of private Members. He thought it was quite clear that there would be no confiscation if there were no obstruction. Between obstruction and the means of overcoming obstruction, it seemed to him that the rights of private Members were likely to pass away. If those rights were snatched away they must certainly pass to the Cabinet. Unless there was some process of dealing with the legislation of the country and doing something to relieve the Government of responsibility for it, he could not see how the House could, for a generation longer, remain an independent body. The time might come when it would be a breach of faith for a Member to vote against the Government representing the Party to which he belonged, just as it was now for a member of the American Federal College to vote against his Party. He would not wish to be a Member of the House on such despicable terms. While freedom was left to him, he would venture, at any rate on this occasion, to vote against a Government which he was most anxious to support on Unionist, Imperialist, and fiscal questions.

*MR. JOHN ELLIS (Nottinghamshire, Rushcliffe) thought the Prime Minister was hardly justified in claiming to have given more notice of this Resolution than had been given on former occasions. On Wednesday night he mentioned, in a nonchalant manner, that he intended to bring forward a Motion to accelerate the Licensing Bill. In consequence of the right hon. Gentleman's new-fangled rules of procedure, Thursday and Friday were practically dies non, as Thursdays were devoted to Supply, and Fridays were, to a large extent, given to private Members' Bills, and Members had, in consequence, become, to a much larger extent than was formerly the case, "week-enders." A notice therefore only appearing in Thursday's Paper for such important business on Friday was therefore rather sharp. He would probably not be doing the right hon. Gentleman any injustice if he stated that the Prime Minister's expectation was to get the Resolution through on Friday without much discussion, but by this time he had probably discovered that the Motion was regarded by the House in a very serious light. Personally, he agreed that one or two of the precedents set by Liberal Governments in this matter were not very good ones, and certainly some of the measures which had eventuated from such drastic proceedings did not go to justify the procedure. Many of the provisions of the Crimes Act of 1887 were dropped before the election of 1892, while the Education Act of 1902 was producing altogether unforeseen consequences, and would have to be altered from top to bottom. But every one of these cases must be considered on its merits. The Prime Minister had not based his case on the usual grounds at all; in fact his speech dealt with so many matters that it alone in the olden days would have afforded matter for six or seven days discussion. He had referred to the Budget, for instance, as uncontroversial. There never was a year in which the Budget required to be more closely scrutinised; and it was not at all certain that it had escaped the taint of recent fiscal controversies.

The right hon. Gentleman had admitted in specific terms that his Motion did contract the liberties of the House and had argued that if it were not passed the House of Commons would become a wholly impotent Assembly. A bad workman always complained of his tools. Never had any Leader of the House less reason to complain of the forms of procedure or of the conduct of the Opposition than the present Prime Minister. There had been so many alterations in the Standing Orders that Members sometimes hardly knew where they were. The whole aim of those alterations had been to fetter Members and fritter away the control of the House of Commons over the executive Government. He wondered sometimes what was the idea of the supporters of the Government of the House of Commons? Did they really regard it as a deliberative Assembly? One would fancy that their only idea of their duties was to come down and register the decrees of the Government without debate, without question, without consideration. One hon. Member actually asked the other day whether it was in order to attack a Cabinet Minister. Good heavens! What were Ministers there for but to be criticised and attacked? The enormous change that had taken place in the relation of the House of Commons to the Government of the day even in his own time could hardly be imagined. Up to quite recently, for instance, the Government had, by Standing Orders, only control of two out of every five hours during which the House sat. It was now, so far as the other side of the House was concerned, simply a machine to register the decrees and wishes of the Government. It was a striking fact that in the days when the greatest legislation was passed through Parliament the Government had the least control of the time of the House. Now, although he had remodelled the Rules and had a large majority at his back, impatient of debate and quite ready to vote for anything, the right hon. Gentleman came forward and confessed himself impotent. The House would never perform its proper function until it adopted some well-matured system of devolution and delegation of its powers. Where the Prime Minister had erred was that in the general conduct of the business of the House, and more especially during the present session, he had failed to recognise that the House of Commons, after all, had in it a great deal of human nature He relied too much upon rules and the particular hour of the clock. That was contrary to the old spirit of the proceedings in the House of Commons. Anyone who took up the Standing Orders of the House would at once see the nature of the Prime Minister's management of the business. Standing Order No. 18 was still unfinished, and in its present form it was unmitigated nonsense and a positive discredit to the Government. But it marked in a most striking way the slatternly way in which the business was conducted by the right hon. Gentleman. During two or three days before Easter the House hardly knew what it was going to do. The House sat for forty-seven days before the Licensing Bill was introduced; sixty-four days of the session elapsed before the Second Reading was taken, and seventy-four days passed before the Committee stage was reached. No instance could be given of so much time being allowed to run by before a first-class Government measure was introduced and dealt with. Constant alterations and postponements and substitutions had taken place, and in regard to the whole conduct of the business of the House there had been a chopping and changing annoying to the last degree to hon. Members who desired to discharge their Parliamentary duties conscientiously. They all knew that the reason for all this was that the Government could not make up their minds until the last moment.

As to the conduct of the Licensing Bill, he did not think the Prime Minister had been quite fair to the Home Secretary, who had been given three hours hard labour upstairs for three days a week upon another measure which he would never carry—the Aliens Bill. With regard to the part taken by the Solicitor-General in the discussions upon this Bill, the right hon. Gentleman was not an Englishman, and they ought to have had representing the Government somebody who had been au courant with the current of temperance reform in this country. In his opinion the First Lord of the Treasury committed a solecism and an offence against the House by coming in late during the discussion on Wednesday last and putting his foot down upon a common agreement which had almost been arrived at on both sides of the House. When this interference took place, the debate had been conducted with terse argumentative speeches which manifested a real desire to get at the root of the matter, and that was the state of things last Wednesday when the Prime Minister hurried in and put his foot down upon the whole thing. The flourishing of these sixty-five pages of, Amendments by the Prime Minister was a little unworthy of him, because hon. Members knew that these Amendments vanished like snow when the governing principles had been disposed of, and many of the Amendments were duplicates. But they had had something else this session besides the general mismanagement and nonchalance of the Prime Minister, for there had been a certain slackness in attendance on this and other Bills of hon. Gentleman opposite. [MINISTERIAL cries of "No, no!"] Upon what, however, did the authority of the House rest? Surely the representative principle. From that point of view the authority of the Government was slipping away. The Standard of that morning said, referring to the Sowerby election—

> "The figures are disappointing. The lesson is unmistakable. It testifies beyond all reasonable doubt to the unwelcome truth that the Government have lost and continue to lose ground throughout the country."

He put it to the right hon. Gentleman whether the time had not almost arrived when self-respecting men ought no longer to refrain from taking the judgment of the country. Knowing as he did that individually those sitting on the Treasury Bench were honourable English gentlemen he was astonished that collectively they could remain Ministers for a single moment after the evidence of by-elections——

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member is going a little too far in discussing the general position of the attitude of the Government with regard to all these measures.

*MR. JOHN ELLIS said the petitions presented to the House testified to the overwhelming opinion of the country against the Bill. Meetings of opponents of the measure had been held all over the country; but it had been found impossible to get a meeting in its favour. There was this volume of opinion against the Bill because it was perceived by those great social and religious elements which existed in our midst, and were the salvation and life of this country, that this Bill struck against moral and social reform. The great army of workers in those causes were to a man opposed to the Bill. He listened with pain to the callous words which the Prime Minister let fall about those who suffered from this great evil, "those people are ruined by their gross and criminal indulgence." The Prime Minister had no pity for the drunkard, or word of sympathy for the widow and orphan. [MINISTERIAL cries of "Oh!"] From the Treasury Bench the word justice was applied solely to a particular trade, and not in any way to its fruits or its victims. What was to his mind the most shocking and astounding element of the whole situation was that that Bill marked the high-water mark of that era of materialism upon which we had entered. It was because the people were a God-fearing people [MINISTERIAL cries of "Oh" and "Order!"], that with a sure instinct they had perceived the real tendency of this Bill. It was because—giving credit to every hon. Member opposite for holding the opposite opinion with sincerity—he was satisfied the Resolution was brought in and pressed on with a view of passing an evil measure, that it would meet with his unmitigated opposition. Hon. Members opposite might rest assured that the Opposition repudiated this Bill from top to bottom, and if it was carried, especially in the way proposed, they washed their hands of it, and on the first opportunity that came to them, and come it would, sooner or later—and he earnestly hoped sooner—this Bill would be effaced from the Statute-book.

*MR. TRITTON (Lambeth, Norwood) said he would not attempt to follow the last speaker beyond thanking him for the lesson he had read to hon. Members on that side, which no doubt would be most thankfully received by all the Members of the Party, as to the slackness of their attendance in the debates. He ventured to hope that those remarks would lead to what no doubt the hon. Member intended, namely, better attendance in future. He wished to make a personal statement, instead of giving a silent vote on this question, which he regarded as one of very great magnitude. It was a question in which he was most deeply interested. He was one of those who had not voted for the Second Reading of the Bill. He was one of those who voted against the Government and in favour of a fourteen years time limit, because he believed with all his heart that a time limit was most necessary in this Bill. He objected to the turning of a licence into a vested interest. He had voted on several other occasions against the Government, and he supposed that before the end of the chapter he would find occasion to do so again. Holding these views, it had been his determination to vote against the Resolution now before the House. Things had occurred which had completely altered that determination, and the thing that weighed with him more than anything else was the speech which was delivered earlier in this discussion by the hon. Member for the Spen Valley Division. The hon. Member was regarded, and rightly regarded, as one of the leaders of the temperance party; he had long been a standard bearer; and he had done most excellent work in the temperance cause throughout the country. The hon. Member was invaluable on the Royal Commission, and having enjoyed his personal friendship for many years he would understand that if he said anything adverse about him he said it with great reluctance. He hoped he would say nothing that would cause the hon. Member any pain. He confessed that when he heard the speech of the hon. Member he was filled with more indignation than he had ever felt on any subject during the twelve years he had been a Member of this House. He ventured to say that that speech was unworthy of the hon. Member. It was unlike his own self. He thought the hon. Member had been carried away by those about him and led to say rather more than he was inclined to say. He thought that speech had done harm to the temperance cause. He did not think the temperance cause was advanced by intemperate language, and the attack on the Prime Minister was one which would be resented by many temperance people throughout the country. He wished the hon. Member to understand what the effect of that speech had been on him. It would lead him not to vote with the hon. Member in the lobby into which he would go, but in the Government lobby. There was no statesman living or dead who had ever sat on the front bench who had done so much for the temperance cause as the Prime Minister. [Laughter.] Hon. Members might laugh, but would they tell him who was the statesman? He called for an answer. Would they tell him who the statesman was There was an Act now on the Statute-book of this country which had done, was doing, and in future would do, an enormous amount of good to save the rising generation from the evils of strong drink. How did that Bill get through. He thought he had as good a right to speak on this subject as any one else. It never would have got through but for the Prime Minister who gave facilities for its being passed. It was to the credit of the Prime Minister that that Bill was passed—a Bill which was doing so much good for the children of the land. Who brought in the Licensing Bill of 1902? Who brought in the Scotch Licensing Bill of 1903? Hon. Members opposite had not told him who had done more than the present occupants of the Treasury Bench for the cause of temperance. He challenged hon. Members to say who had done more in that cause than the right hon. Gentleman. He was sorry the right hon. Gentleman was not in his place at the present moment because he was going to make an earnest appeal to him. He himself thought it was premature to bring forward the Resolution now before the House. He thought the Prime Minister had not given sufficient time for the discussion of this most important measure. Great issues were dependent upon it. He was going to ask the Prime Minister, if not too late now, to be a little more generous and to give a few more days for the Committee stage and the report stage. There were many hon. Members on the Government side of the House who would agree with him when he said that they had been treated in a niggardly way. The Prime Minister might have given them more time for the discussion of the measure. He had thought it right to state the reasons which had led him to support the Resolution and to dissociate himself entirely from the attack on the Prime Minister. In making this protest as a temperance man and a moderate speaker he thought he had not in any way departed from the courtesies of debate.

*MR. MOULTON (Cornwall, Launceston) said he hoped the House would not suppose he was the less hearty in his support of the Amendment if he began his remarks by saying that he thought in this matter every Member of the House was now not in a Party but in a judicial position. They were not discussing what legislation was to be. They were discussing what the privileges of the House for discussing legislation were to be. He had before pointed out that the Rules of the House which govern procedure were Rules to protect the weak. They were like the Rules of a game. It should be a matter of honour with each individual Member not to interfere with the sanctity of those rules which were to protect him when he was in a minority. In this case there were only two questions to be considered. The first was raised by the tone of the Prime Minister in bringing this Resolution before the House. The right hon. Gentleman brought it forward in a way which intimated that he looked upon this form of closure as an ordinary feature of Parliamentary procedure, and having said that there was but a short time left of the session, he sat down with the air of one who had said enough to justify his proposal without giving any grounds based upon the nature of the Bill, or the seriousness of the occasion, for using this particular remedy. This raised the first question on which they had to decide, viz.—"Are we going to admit closure by compartments as an ordinary Parliamentary procedure, to be used by the Leader of the majority of the House as and when he pleased? If they were prepared to do this let it be done, but do not let the present majority do it in respect of particular measures before it was made the Rule of the House. If they abused their power in this respect they were in this dilemma: either the other side would retaliate, and Parliamentary procedure would be thereby lowered, or the other side would not retaliate because they had a keener sense of Parliamentary honour than those who now formed the majority. He thought that hon. Members on the other side would feel that each of these alternatives was one that they did not willingly associate themselves with.

He would consider for a moment whether it would be desirable to make closure by compartments a part of ordinary Parliamentary procedure. It was a necessary part of our procedure in Committee that Amendments should be taken in strict verbal order and that during the discussion upon each Amendment speakers should be confined to that which was thus before the House, and should be forbidden to refer to subsequent Amendments even though they were far more important. It followed that if the total length of the discussion were fixed, the necessary discussion on the earlier Amendments left the later ones without the possibility of any debate or criticism. A Minister could thus by the use of closure by compartments shield any portion of the machinery of a Bill from open criticism on the floor of the House. They were not allowed to discuss the details of a Bill when they were discussing the Second Reading. This was natural because a roving discussion of the details of a Bill would lessen the value of the debate on its principle. Yet they were going to allow a Minister so to mould the time for point by point criticism of the Bill that much of it would pass without being examined at all. It made it a matter of haphazard what was to be discussed at all, and a Minister would be enabled to shield what might be most important in the machinery entirely from Parliamentary criticism. Let him give an example from the Bill. So far as the broad principle of the Bill was concerned to establish compensation by equalising the loss of a licence over the trade, he thought that principle had supporters on both sides of the House. But it was the way in which it was done, and still more the indirect consequences of the machinery by which it was done that made it a cloak for largely increasing the value of the licensed houses, and handing over this huge property to the brewers and the licence-holders. It was that which they, on that side of the House, most strongly opposed; because they felt that it would cripple the cause of temperance in the future. This great evil lurked in what might be called the detailed arrangement of the Bill—the objects of the Bill—and not in the principle of giving compensation from the trade. They believed that these so called details were the main object of the Bill, and that so far as the aims of its authors were concerned the Bill would become more valuable for the object in view if everything connected with the machinery broke down.

The second question was whether, if the procedure was to remain an exceptional one the present Bill was an occasion when it should be resorted to. He had listened to nine-tenths of the debate, nad he had not heard a shadow of a case made out for applying this procedure in the case of this particular Bill. The only argument of the Prime Minister was that six and a half months was the full Parliamentary time at the disposal of the House; but did the Prime Minister say that it was a hard and fast necessity that the House should rise on the 9th or 12th August, and that they could not sit for a week later to discuss the machinery of a Bill on which the whole licensing system of England depended? Was that consideration to override all public welfare? This was not a case like that of the Home Rule Bill, when over eighty days were taken up with discussion; but only a question of a week or a fortnight more—which short period would not have been required if there had been a proper economy of Parliamentary time at the beginning of the session. Could it be suggested that the House must necessarily rise in the beginning of August? If so, that was a short and easy method for getting important Bills through without discussion. The Government might introduce at the beginning of the session Dog Bills and other petty measures, and put off their more important Bills till a late period of the Parliamentary year, and then say that there was to be no detailed criticism of them. This surrender of the rights of criticism and discussion by the whole House was not in the interest even of the Bills brought forward by the Government themselves. It deprived them of all moral claim to respect by subsequent Parliaments. And it was in truth the individual members of the Party who were the cause of such steps being taken. Their disapproval would prevent the Government having resource to such measures. He knew the humorous exaggeration of the hon. Member for North Armagh, who said that he was sent there to keep the Unionist Government in power, whether they were right or wrong—that that was all his duty. They knew perfectly well that the hon. and gallant Member did not really mean that he felt himself free to act otherwise than honourably, but the profession of such sentiments weakened the moral hold which the members of the Party had on the Government, and which might have prevented this Motion ever being brought forward. What he claimed was, that the Government should know that a Motion like this, unless justified in the eyes of an impartial tribunal, would not receive favour from even the right hon. Gentleman's own side. He was sure there never was a Bill more stamped with all that should make hon. Members shrink from shielding it from public criticism. It was professedly a Bill to alter the existing state of things in favour of a private body of people. Beyond question these licences had been granted under safeguards which were now proposed to be removed. Speaker after speaker had admitted that the existence of the present powers of the licensing magistrates had greatly diminished the value of the licences.

* MR. SPEAKER: The hon. and learned Member is now discussing the merits of the Bill.

MR. MOULTON said he only meant to demonstrate that this was a type of Bill which ought not to be dealt with in the manner proposed by the Resolution of the Prime Minister. He would begin at the other end. What circumstances would warrant such a procedure? If a Bill was of an urgent character, if it was one on which public order depended, and the time at the disposal of the House would not suffice for its minute criticism, it might be necessary that Parliament should say "We should rather have it in the rough than not at all." But no such circumstances existed here. Deliberate misconduct or obstruction on the part of the Opposition Party, paralysing by means of the forms of the House the realities which underlay those forms, might give a moral justification for applying the drastic Motion proposed by the Prime Minister. But he thought it was conceded by everybody that there had been no obstruction. The Prime Minister would not suggest that there had been obstruction. If he had suggested it the evidence of those who had been present throughout the debates would have pointed to a very different verdict. Nobody pretended that there had been obstruction. So that there was no justification for the closure on that ground. There might be other imaginable causes for such a Motion. A strong mandate might have been given from the country; the House might have been elected ad hoc to pass a particular Bill, and if there was delay in passing the measure it might have been said that the House was culpable because they were over-riding the wishes of the people. But he would ask the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister if he could say, in his heart, that he was voicing the opinion of the country? If the right hon. Gentleman were to look at the question impartially, he would be obliged to admit that the country had repeatedly, by the results of recent elections, and by every method by which it could express its opinion, shown that it was against this change. Again, the character of this Bill was such that the Government ought itself to shrink from applying this Motion. It was unquestionably a Bill in favour of a great organisation—probably the most powerful—of the supporters of the Government. He did not for a moment say that devotion to temperance was confined to that side of the House. He believed that some of the most ardent workers in the temperance cause were to be found on the Ministerial Benches. But there were two facts to which they could not shut their eyes. One was, that the curse of England was drink; and the other was, that the main support of the Unionist Party was the drink trade. This Bill was a Bill in favour of that great and powerful body. He asked every hon. Member opposite who was in favour of temperance reform to examine themselves closely, and see whether by the proposal of the Prime Minister the desire was not only to support Party ends, but to deprive them, as well as the Opposition, of the rights and privileges of Parliament. He was sure that if this House were going to maintain its liberties, dignity, and authority on questions of procedure, hon. Gentlemen opposite must tell their leaders that they ought not to allow the use of their majority to prevent the full examination of measures brought before the House and thus to override the rights of the minority.

SIR CARNE RASCH (Essex, Chelmsford) said he had some sympathy with the hon. Member for the Spen Valley and other hon. Gentlemen opposite who desired to make drunken people sober by keeping sober people thirsty. He, however, regretted that the Prime Minister had had to closure this interesting Bill by compartments. Hon. Members on both sides, however, had brought that state of things on themselves. They could not have it both ways. If they spoke in an unlimited fashion on every subject under the sun from February to June, they could hardly expect to luxuriate in long speeches from June to August. It all arose from long speeches. To use an ordinary simile, it was impossible to put a quart into a pint pot. It was because speeches were so inordinately long that the present state of affairs had arisen. He had been in constant attendance at the House during the discussion on the Licensing Bill He did not trouble the House with any trivial views of his own, but he might say now that he did not think that the long speeches which had been delivered were entirely the fault of hon. Members. He noticed in connection with this particular Bill that when an hon. Gentleman spoke for ten minutes, he found next morning that the newspapers said, "After a few remarks from Mr. A—" or perhaps his name was omitted altogether. On the other hand, an hon. Gentleman who spoke for fifty or sixty minutes and said everything that every one else had already said, found himself credited with three-quarters of a column. Mr. A's constitutents might say they would have to get rid of him and the result was that he spoke longer, whereas Mr. B's speeches never came to an end. With reference to the matter under discussion he would venture to say that the only reason why the Prime Minister was obliged to apply a leaf out of Mr. Gladstone's book to this interesting Bill was on account of long speeches.

*Mr. J. H. LEWIS (Flint Boroughs) said that there was one aspect of the question which had not yet received attention. He wished to refer to the way in which the Principality of Wales was to be treated. The question whether Wales was to be included or excluded would in the ordinary way be discussed on Clause 9; but it would be impossible that the clause could be discussed if the Motion were carried. Before Clause 9 could be considered a number of varied and important questions would have to be discussed. Where, therefore, could the Welsh Members have an opportunity of urging that Wales should be excluded from the operation of the Act. A great deal had been said during the discussions on the Bill as to a mandate for it not being given in the case of England. No such question could possibly arise in the case of Wales. For thirty-six years Wales had given overwhelming majorities in favour of temperance legislation. The present Bill was a death blow to temperance in Wales. He appealed to the right hon. Gentleman to give the Welsh Members some opportunity of discussing this question. When any great contentious measure was brought forward the application of the Bill to Wales was always put in the last clause, and it was impossible for the Welsh Members to properly discuss the propriety of excluding Wales from the scope of the Bill when closure by compartments was applied. Wales had a special and exceptional position in this matter. It had been dealt with exceptionally by Parliament as regards temperance reform. When the Welsh Local Veto Bill was before the House of Commons it was remarkable that twenty-five Welsh Members voted for it and only one against it. That was an indication of the position of Wales in regard to this great question. Therefore, it would be wise for the right hon. Gentleman to give an opportunity to the Welsh Members to discuss whether Wales should or should not be excluded. The right hon. Gentleman refused that in the case of the Education Bill, and the result was that he now had to bring in a coercion Bill. This trampling on a small nationality really did not pay the Government in the end. Wales was a small country, but it had a right to be heard on this question, which vitally affected its well-being.

*Sir J. STIRLING-MAXWELL (Glasgow, College) said the arguments of hon. Gentlemen opposite made it very difficult to agree with their conclusions, yet, although he was a friend of the Government and of the Bill, he did agree with them to a large extent. He ventured to think that his right hon. friend the Prime Minister had not made out a case for the application of the closure procedure at this particular stage of the discussion. He understood the argument for the Motion was that the Bill dealt with a very limited issue, that its main subject had been amply discussed on First and Second Reading, and that the enormous mass of Amendments before the House either attacked again the main principle of the Bill or else attempted to introduce changes of the general law which it was not advisable or convenient to make at present. He thought that would be a good case for applying the closure, even at such an early stage of the debate, but he did not think an impartial examinations of those dreadful sixty-five pages of Amendments would lead to the conclusion that such an argument applied. The application of a scheme of compensation to our existing licensing law was a very difficult matter, and he did not wonder that a great many suggestions had been made in matters of detail, some of which had already been adopted or met by the Solicitor-General, who had conducted the debate with such marked skill and good humour. He thought the greater part of the Amendments dealt with important matters, and were directed against the introduction into the general law of a very important constitutional change. It seemed more than doubtful whether the authors of the Bill had really intended it to effect such a change. To many of them who were interested in the question of temperance reform it appeared that the change which limited the discretion of the magistrates as to a renewal of licence would really give away what he might call the key of the position of temperance reform. They thought it almost a matter of conscience that this important question should be debated fairly, and he appealed to his right hon. friend to extend the limit of time allowed to the Bill so that such important questions as this might receive adequate discussion.

MR. SAMUEL EVANS (Glamorganshire, Mid.) said that he did not think that the suggestion made by the right hon. Baronet would meet the views of the House. What he proposed to ask the House was this, if this Resolution were carried, could the Bill be properly discussed? He cared very little for precedents in this matter, and less for opinions of the occupants of the Treasury Bench in past years and past Governments. The only question which, in his opinion, the House ought to have in view, in considering the proposals of the Prime Minister, was whether or not, having regard to the particular Bill before the House, it could, if this Resolution were carried, be adequately and properly discussed. He had great sympathy with Governments who had but little time to carry through their business, but on this occasion his sympathy was not so great, because they were now near the end of a session in which the time had been muddled away from the commencement. He quite admitted that the Parliamentary machine was not at present efficient. No business could be carried on satisfactorily by the 670 Members of Parliament under the present procedure, and it was a very great pity, in his opinion, that the rules could not be amended in such a way as to enable Bills which had reached a certain stage to be carried over from one session of Parliament to the next, if within the ordinary limits of the session the Bill could not be adequately and properly discussed. He had listened with sorrow to the speech of the hon. Member for Norwood, who had the cause of temperance so much at heart. Everyone who had listened to temperance matters in this House would agree that the contributions of the hon. Member for Norwood had been of the most excellent kind. His speeches, always short, were among the most eloquent heard in the House, and it was with pain and regret that he heard the hon. Member get up and say that he was going to vote for this proposal because it was resisted by the Opposition. So far as the speech of the hon. Member for the Spen Valley was concerned, he would say nothing whatever about it, except that he agreed with every word that the hon. Member had said.

So far as the conduct of the Bill was concerned, he would say nothing about the Home Secretary, except that the right hon. Gentleman had not had much experience in conducting Bills through the House, that he did not trouble the House very much, and only occasionally read something which had been written down for him, or which he had written down himself. But no Bill had ever been conducted better than this, when the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor-General was left in charge of it. He disagreed with one of his hon. friends who had stated that an Irishman ought not to be in charge of the Bill. The right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite was Solicitor-General for England, and even if, at the beginning of the discussion, he was not acquainted with the details of the English licensing system, he had shown that he could conduct the Bill moderately, sensibly, and with good humour. If the Solicitor-General had been given carte blanche to listen to the speeches and consider the Amendments, he could have got the Bill through Committee, and it would have emerged from the ordeal in such a shape as to have commanded, at any rate, some respect in the eyes of the country. The Bill really required to be more fully discussed than an ordinary measure. Its source of origin was the brewers. Almost every reforming agency in the country disagreed with its proposals. The Prime Minister had declared the Bill to be in the interests of "eternal justice." The Bishops, clergy, and ministers of all denominations were supposed to know something about justice—they certainly dealt in matters affecting eternity—and when the two elements were combined in eternal justice, surely the opinion of the Bishops and clergy, which was against the Bill, ought to carry some weight. But the right hon. Gentleman practically told the Bishops to stick to their lasts, to wear their own aprons, or whatever the proper phrase might be. Moreover, the medical profession, who were concerned mainly with the physique of the country, had through some of their most eminent representatives declared against the Bill. The working of the measure depended absolutely upon the details of the scheme, and it was essential that those details should be perfected as far as possible by the combined wisdom and intelligence of the House. It was impossible for even a single Amendment to be considered satisfactorily in the time allotted to the Bill, and consequently the measure would not be properly discussed at all. If the procedure of the House was to be altered in any way, it should be done by a Resolution applying to the whole of the business. The Committee stage was the most essential stage in connection with such a measure as the Licensing Bill. It was a pity that on the Committee stage of such Bills there was not fuller freedom from Party ties. Many Members on the other side would be glad to vote on the questions affected without being driven by the crack of the Party whip.

*MR. SPEAKER intimated that the remarks of the hon. Member hardly applied to the Motion before the House.

MR. SAMUEL EVANS admitted that he had wandered somewhat from his general argument. The question was of the greatest importance from the Parliamentary point of view, and he would be only too delighted if something could be done to carry the business through. It was the business of Parliament to do work. Hon. Members who had considered the matter must have been astounded at the waste of time in the House. The present proposal, however, would not save time. Apparently they could not get anything done until they began to waste time, but it was not by spasmodic changes of this kind that the dignity of the House of Commons would be upheld. He objected to the Licensing Bill, and therefore objected to the proposals to hurry the Bill through. The Motion would form a very bad precedent to future Governments, who would take advantage of it to transact the business of the country improperly.

SIR JOHN KENNAWAY (Devonshire, Honiton) freely admitted it was a Party measure most keenly contested, and as such must be dealt with and carried through. It had been said that the Bishops and clergy were totally opposed to the Bill, but the fact was that the Bishops had passed a resolution strongly in favour of a time limit. His idea of a time limit was that there should be some time at which the Bill should be reconsidered and Parliament have an opportunity of again pronouncing an opinion upon it. It was not fair, therefore, to say that the Bishops and clergy were opposed to the Bill as a whole. But there were many chairmen of quarter sessions who had spoken strongly in favour of the Bill, because they believed the principle on which it was based was a right one. He admitted fully that it ought to be discussed, because there were many points on which it deserved consideration and he would strongly join in the appeal to the Government to enlarge the time for discussion. He should like to have an assurance from the Government that they would fairly consider Amendments to be submitted from either side. It was not to their interests to have a Bill forced through the House, and if it were it would be opposed to the moral sense of the country. The House, however, should be master of its own business, and ought not to allow itself to become a laughing-stock in the country. The country expected the House of Commons to do business, and he thought with the Prime Minister, they ought to bring their business within moderate limits. If the Government would grant a little more time, he did not despair of the Bill being fairly well discussed. There were still three stages of the Bill to go through and they had no right to assume that the discussion would be of a perfunctory character. A good deal of time had been wasted this session, and if three or four weeks discussion were allowed on the Committee stage of this Bill, the only effect would be that other important measures would have to be rushed through next month. He should vote for the Resolution, but hoped the Government would be ready to listen to a fair consideration of the Amendments.

*MR. BARLOW (Somersetshire, Frome) said that he should not have intervened in this debate but for the fact that he considered the course which the Government had adopted in regard to the Licensing Bill was a very serious one, not merely in connection with that measure, but also for the future well-being, and indeed the authority, of Parliament. He did not see how the Government could expect the country to give that assent and support which was supposed to be given to the measures passed by the House of Commons to a measure which was passed under the operation of the closure after such a very short and wholly inadequate time had been allowed for the discussion of the measure; and action of this kind prevented the House of Commons from being the master of its own business, and utterly took away from it the power of shaping its measures. It was the duty of the Government, not only to get measures through, but to afford the House of Commons adequate time and opportunities to discuss, at any rate, the leading features and provisions of this and other Bills. If the Resolution before the House were adopted, he did not think anyone could say that the House had been afforded an adequate opportunity of looking into the most important parts of the Bill. It was all the more important that the House should have an adequate opportunity to examine this measure closely, because the subject was a thorny and difficult one, which had been considered by a Royal Commission. When the Government brought in a Bill which was not in accordance with the recommendations made, either by the minority or the majority Reports of Lord Peel's Commission, they ought to be specially careful to give the House of Commons time to examine the provisions of the measure, and to see the reasons why they had not carried out the suggestions made. He had listened with very great interest to-day and on Friday to the speeches which had been made on both sides of the House. The hon. Member for Altrincham had said that he would vote for the proposal of the Government, though he admitted that he would do so with great uneasiness, because he thought the closure was a detestable action. That was very strong language for a supporter of the Government to use about their action. Other Members had suggested that if the Government could not see their way to give up this proposal they would, at any rate, give the House rather more time to examine the Bill than they proposed to do at present. Many such suggestions had come from the Government side of the House, and he hoped that those suggestions would lead to a modification of the proposals of the Government. The Bill was one which required careful examination. It dealt with very important matters affecting the social life of the people of this country, and he was certain it could be—and he spoke in this way in no Party sense — very materially improved by adequate and reasonable discussion across the floor of the House. Some improvements had already been made, but most important parts of the Bill were as yet unreached. It had been said that the measure was not submitted to the country, and from that point of view, he thought the Government ought to give full and ample time in the Committee stage to see if the Bill could not be made a more workable and reasonable measure than it was now. The discussion on the Opposition side of the House had not been obstructive. If there had been any obstructive discussion it had been on the Government side of the House directly after the interval allowed for dinner. That was the only time when any acute observer could detect obstruction. On the Opposition side of the House they had endeavoured to discuss the Bill fairly and reasonably, with the idea of making it a more workable and better measure. He thought that if measures of this kind were to be subjected to closure by compartments in the way proposed by the Government, when they had been so briefly discussed as this Bill had been, it would be a bad day for the country, for the House of Commons, and for constitutional government in this country.

*MR. MARSHALL HALL (Lancashire, Southport) said an appeal had been made by the hon. and learned Member for the Launceston Division to the Ministerialists to consider this matter in a judical spirit, and it was because he was anxious to do so that he had determined to support the Government, as he did not think any private feeling of his own ought to interfere with his judicial duty. He was personally against this proposal, and so far as he could, would resist any interference with the rights and liberties of the House of Commons. It was a great pity that a Bill of the magnitude of the Licensing Bill should be rushed through the House, but he was in this far more serious difficulty. He believed that the Bill as framed and when carried would be in aid of temperance, and he yielded to no man in his anxiety to see the cause of temperance advanced. He also believed that this Bill would do another thing. It would remove the possibility of a grave injustice being done to a trade which had not deserved that injustice should be done to it. If he was right in that, the difficulty which presented itself to his mind was this, Was this Bill to be passed or not? If he could take seriously the protestations of his hon. friends opposite that they really wished the Bill to be fairly discussed and passed if a proper measure, he might take another view in regard to the Resolution; but he regretted to say that he was afraid that the anxiety of his hon. friends opposite was that the Bill should not be passed in any form or state whatever. He had only to listen to the passionate invective of the hon. Member for Spen Valley to find what was the Opposition feeling in regard to this particular Bill. When he listened to the impertinent buffoonery of the hon. Member for Northampton [OPPOSITION cries of "Oh!" and "Withdraw"]—he felt it was a deliberate—[Renewed cries of "Withdraw."]

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member must not use discourteous language of another Member.

*MR. MARSHALL HALL :I withdraw it, but if the hon. Member were here I do not think he would wish it withdrawn, for this reason—I think the hon. Member for Northampton takes pleasure in turning to ridicule matters before the House. [Cries of "Withdraw."]

*MR. SPEAKER said the hon. Member had withdrawn the words.

*MR. MARSHALL HALL said he withdrew unreservedly and at once any expression he ought not to use, as he thought any hon. Member would do. He looked upon the speech of the hon. Member for Northampton as a waste of time. In saying that he hoped he might be within the limits of Parliamentary etiquette. The hon. Member was apt, and took great delight in turning into ridicule matters which did not always seem to be subjects for ridicule; and these speeches showed him that there was a wish on the other side of the House that this Bill should not become law. Therefore they came face to face with two alternatives—either this Bill must pass or fail. If it was to be passed it seemed to him that after the speech of the Prime Minister the only way it could be passed was by the application of closure by compartments. If this was to be applied he joined with his hon friends who had just spoken, the two hon. Baronets below the gangway, who had asked that more time should be given to the discussion of the two great principles involved. He would like more time given to the consideration of the ultimate destination of the compensation and the allocation of it; and he would like to see the rights of the actual licence-holders protected beyond any possibility of their being taken from them. To say that this was a brewers' measure entirely was not a just criticism of the Bill. It was not right to say that this Bill was dictated by the brewers. It was a Bill required by the public and by the whole of the licensed trade in the interests of temperance. He asked that the interests of the servants of the brewers and of the public in this matter should be safeguarded, and that ample opportunity would be given to discuss the rights that they had under this Bill. He said again that this was a measure in favour of temperance, and he spoke with some knowledge. He had had as much experience, if not more, than a great many hon. Members in regard to the working of the Licensing Acts of this country, and he said without fear of contradiction that many benches of magistrates had refrained from taking away licences which otherwise they would have taken away, and thereby reduced the number of licences, because they felt that they could not do so without the risk of doing an injustice, and they thought that the lesser of two evils was the better to choose on those particular occasions.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member is discussing the merits of the Bill and not the Motion.

*MR. MARSHALL HALL said he had not meant to say more than that it was a temperance measure, and he regretted that he had been tempted to go beyond that and to give the reasons for thinking that it was a temperance measure. The Bill was one which the majority of the House wanted to see carried. It was a Bill of the greatest importance, and if hon. Gentlemen were to go to the country upon the Bill, he had very little doubt that the voice of the country would be in favour of it. The question was whether they were to subordinate the wishes of the majority to the prejudices of the minority.

There was only one other topic he wished to discuss, and that was that the opportunity seemed to have been taken by the somewhat intemperate advocates of temperance outside the House of Commons to make the passing of this Resolution a vehicle for threats against individual Members of the House. He himself had been the recipient of letter after letter from persons threatening to do all in their power to make others vote against him night and day if he supported this Resolution. He knew whence that class of letters came, and he knew how to treat them. But if one thing would induce him to do his best to support the Government in this matter it would be the threat that any private injury could occur to himself for doing what he believed it to be his honourable duty to do on this occasion. He had no wish to trespass on the time of the House any longer, and he regretted that in almost his first speech in the House he should have been betrayed into using an expression with regard to the hon. Member for Northampton, which was unparliamentary and which he had withdrawn. He felt very strongly on this subject, and he regretted the action which was generally taken by a section of the temperance party on this question. He maintained that hon. Members on the Ministerial side of the House were just as keenly interested in temperance as his hon. friends opposite; and it was because he was an advocate of temperance, and because he honestly believed that the Bill would do good, and because he believed that the Resolution under discussion was the only way in which this Bill could be passed into law, that he would give his vote for the Prime Minister's Motion, and take the consequences, whatever they might be to himself.

*MR. HELME (Lancashire, Lancaster) said that it was because of the strength of the feeling that the necessity of the case demanded a more careful consideration of this Bill than could be given to it if the House assented to the proposal of the Prime Minister, that he entered his most emphatic protest against it. So far as could be judged from the expressions of opinion that had come from their constituencies hon. Members on each side of the House were face to face with evidence, that could not be disputed, that the country agreed that the House could not give proper consideration to this Bill under the time limit proposed by the Prime Minister. The public regarded this proposal as a question whether the trade should control the State or the State control the trade, and, further, they were justified in opposing the Motion to the best of their ability on the ground that it would degrade the proceedings of Parliament. As the Bill now stood it was entirely subversive of the best interests of the country in connection with a most important question, and why should the Government say that the Committee stage should be curtailed? During the discussions in Committee it had been discovered that the powers of the magistrates had been so greatly impaired as to upset the conceptions of the people in regard to the Bill when it was first introduced. If ever more deliberation was required for any Bill it was justified in this case, because most important concessions had been made by the Government. One was that a licence to be given in future should not come within the scope of the compensation clause of this measure, and just when they were dealing with the question of magisterial control the Prime Minister stopped discussion suddenly by this drastic proposal. The Government should be prepared to consider the equities of the case. The Government claimed that they represented the opinion of the country, but all the evidence was against that assertion, and even among their own supporters it was admitted that there was an increasing volume of popular opinion against the proposals in the Bill. That being the case the Prime Minister had no right to hurry the Bill through the House in the way he was doing. It was not true that any national interest was at stake if this Bill did not pass. It touched one of the greatest interests in another direction—the sobriety of the people. The national supremacy of this nation depended upon the skill of its workmen, and that, again, depended on the sobriety of the hands engaged in industry; effort in handicraft was paralysed if the brain was not clear from the influence of drink, but there were higher interests than commercial ones. Therefore, in opposing the forcing of this Bill through the House by closure, they were serving the highest and noblest interests of the country as well as endeavouring to preserve the constitutional liberties and privileges of this House. The mere fact that 171 Amendments had been put down by Members on the Government Benches showed that there was much room to improve the measure.

And, it being half-past Seven of the Clock, the debate stood adjourned.

LICENSING BILL (PROCEDURE).

Order read, for resuming adjourned debate on Amendment to Question [1st July], "That the proceedings in Committee and on Report of the Licensing Bill shall be brought to a conclusion in the manner hereinafter mentioned on six allotted days:

(b) The proceedings in Committee on Clauses 2 and 3 on the second allotted day.

(c) The proceedings in Committee on Clause 4 on the third allotted day.

(e) The proceedings on Report on any new clauses and on Amendments to Clauses 1, 2, and 3 of that Bill, be brought to a conclusion on the fifth allotted day, and

(f) The proceedings on Report be concluded on the sixth allotted day.

After this Order comes into operation, any day shall be considered an allotted day for the purposes of this Order on which the Licensing Bill is put down as the first Order of the Day.

At 11 p.m. on the said allotted days, or if the day is a Friday at 4.30 p.m., the Chairman or Speaker shall put forthwith the Question or Questions on any Amendment or Motion already proposed from the Chair, and shall next proceed successively to put forthwith the Question on any Amendments moved by the Government of which notice has been given (but no other Amendments) and on every Question necessary to dispose of the allotted business to be concluded on the allotted day.

In the case of Government Amendments or of Government new clauses or schedules, he shall put only the Question that the Amendment be made, or that the clause or schedule be added to the Bill, as the case may be.

At 12 midnight on the day on which the Third Reading of the Bill is put down as first Order, or, if that day is a Friday, at 5.30 p.m., the Speaker shall put forthwith any Question necessary to conclude the proceedings on that stage of the Bill.

Proceeding to which this Order relates shall not be interrupted (except at an Afternoon Sitting at 7.30 p.m.) under the provisions of any Standing Order relating to Sittings of the House.

After the passing of this Order, on any day on which any proceedings on the Licensing Bill stand as the first Order of the Day, no dilatory Motion on the Bill, nor under Standing Order No. 10, nor Motion to postpone a clause, shall be received unless moved by the Minister in charge of the Bill, and the Question on any such Motion shall be put forthwith. Nor shall any opposed Private Business be set down at the Evening Sitting for consideration on any of the allotted days or on the day on which the Third Reading of the Bill is put down as first Order.

If progress be reported, the Chairman shall put this Order in force in any subsequent sitting of the Committee."—(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

Which Amendment was—

"In line 1, to leave out all the words after the word 'That,' and insert the words 'this House declines to consider a proposal to deprive the House of Commons, without any justification in the previous course of the debate, of all power of reasonable and adequate discussion in respect of a measure which seeks, in the absence of any authority from the country, to make fundamental and much controverted changes in laws vitally affecting the well-being of the people."—(Mr. Asquith.)

*MR. HELME, continuing his speech, said when the Prime Minister asked the House to consent to his proposal the right hon. Gentleman stated that every such appeal should be considered on its merits; if so, this Bill must not be rushed through. Had such a consideration governed business at the present time, no such attempt would have been made to limit the discussion on the Licensing Bill. The reason for the lack of time at this date was the want of skill and lack of courage on the part of the Government in not bringing in the Bill earlier. Having failed in that important particular, the right hon. Gentleman now sought to restrict the liberty of the House in respect to the most important subject that had been brought forward for discussion at the present time. The 12th of August and the attractions of the moors should not be allowed to weigh against the public interest, and the House, therefore, had a right to endeavour to prevent these proposals being carried into effect. Every Government had a right to rely on the loyalty of the Party supporting it; but if the right hon. Gentleman pressed his followers to give a Party vote on this question, the vote would be given against the better judgment of many hon. Members on the Unionist side of the House. That, of course, was no concern of the Opposition, whose clear duty was to oppose the proposal and the Bill to the utmost in their power, and if defeated, support the statement of their leader in the clearest manner and refuse to accept the Bill as a settlement of the licensing question. They must carry the question to the hustings and allow the constituencies to give their verdict in the ballot boxes—at any rate he for one would support the interests of the nation against that of the trade.

MR. SPEAR (Devonshire, Tavistock) said that, having regard to the fact that the Government had passed the Childrens Bill, the Habitual Drunkards Bill, and the Scottish Licensing Bill, he had looked forward with the greatest hope to the measure now under consideration; and he was not even now without hope that there might be found in it the foundation of an enactment which would promote temperance by methods which would at the same time be just and equitable to the holders of licences. Nevertheless, he felt that there were grave difficulties in the measure, and he ventured to think that the time allotted by the right hon. Gentleman for its discussion was altogether insufficient for the purpose. It would not be in the interests either of temperance or of the trade that the measure should be passed through the House immaturely and imperfectly, with the result that it would be reconsidered with all the bitterness which was unhappily aroused by the question. He hoped that the Government would give more time, so that a final settlement might be secured. The Opposition had recognised the justice of compensation, and he had been hopeful that the Government would endeavour to meet the Opposition, and to seek to promote a lasting settlement. While not prepared by his vote to take any steps to destroy the Bill, he hoped that even yet time might be given to remove defects in it and to secure a permanent settlement of the licensing question.

Mr. ATHERLEY-JONES (Durham, N.W.) said the speech to which the House had just listened might be taken correctly to reflect the private opinion of perhaps the majority of hon. Members sitting opposite. No reasonable man could doubt but that the time offered by the Government was wholly inadequate for the fair deliberation that Parliament was entitled to in such a matter as this. The right hon. Gentleman had quoted the precedent of Mr. Gladstone's Motion in 1893, when the Home Rule Bill was before the House, but there was no analogy between Mr. Gladstone's action then and that of the present Government now. When Mr. Gladstone proposed his closure Resolution in 1893 the House had been in Committee for twenty-eight days, but the Home Rule Bill had been under discussion in the House of Commons for no less than eighty-two days, whilst in this case the Bill had only been debated on Second Reading for two and a half days and before the Committee two days. He did not propose to compare in their intricacies and their far-reaching results the constitutional changes sought to be made by the Home Rule Bill of 1893 with the Licensing Bill of 1904, but, as had been pointed out by the right hon. Member for the Cambridge University, this matter affected the welfare of the people in their social, moral, and economic conditions to an extent which it was impossible to conceive any other measure would affect. This Bill would become law and the Leader of the House when bringing in a measure which he intended to pass into law was bound to take every care that deliberation and debate in this House on every clause were safeguarded. It was far different with regard to the Home Rule Bill of 1893. Mr. Gladstone knew it was doomed, and he would never have attempted to pass his closure Resolutions but for two reasons, one of which was that the Bill would not pass into law without a further appeal to the country and the other that there was a mass of domestic legislation which he desired to promote at the time. Speaking from a House of Commons point of view he asserted that any hon. Member who really considered this question fairly and squarely must undoubtedly come to the conclusion that justice had not been done to the honour and dignity of that Assembly nor had anything been done to secure its efficiency in the future. There were in this Bill a number of most complicated questions which required discussion; the discretion of the magistrate, a question not of principle but of modus, and the question of compensation and its incidence. There were scores of controversial topics of vast magnitude in this Bill. It would not be possible, even if the House agreed among themselves that certain Amendments should be adopted, for a Committee of twenty experts in local reform to come to a decision on the matter in the six days to be allotted, let alone a Chamber of 670 Members. He quite agreed that the tactics of the Opposition with regard to this Bill were obstructive, using that word in its legitimate and proper sense, because they regarded this as vicious legislation which should be opposed by all their power. But while that was the case the responsibility for affording full opportunities for discussion must still lie with the Government. Therefore it was that he joined in the appeal made by hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House that the right hon. Gentleman would consent to extend the absolutely inadequate amount of time in order that the Bill might be properly discussed.

Colonel LOCKWOOD (Essex, Epping) said he found no difficulty in voting for the Resolution before the House because he had a very strong desire to see this legislation properly carried through. Many Members, like himself, disliked any attempts to infringe on the ordinary Rules of Procedure and to restrict the time for the discussion of business, but there were occasions like the present when it became necessary. It was an unpleasant duty, which had been occasionally forced on the Leaders on both sides, and hon. Gentlemen opposite had adopted a similar position in precisely the same way. The Motion was a necessity. The hon. Gentleman who had just spoken gave the case away. He said he detested and hated the Bill, and thought it right to obstruct it in every way. He did not mention the word "obstruction"; but there were more ways than one of choking a dog. It was a very easy matter to smother a Bill with Amendments; but the business of the Government was to legislate. Hon. Gentlemen opposite would allow that without this Motion it would be impossible to get the Licensing Bill through in Parliamentary time. He had heard allusions to moors and shooting; but, as far as he knew, his hon. friends would be content to remain in attendance until the Bill were passed. Hon. Gentlemen opposite were determined that, if they could prevent it, the Bill should not be passed. What was the alternative? If they were unable to pass the Bill, they would have to resign; but with a majority of ninety they did not intend to resign. Why should they resign to please hon. Gentlemen opposite? Their intention was to pass such legislation as they thought fit. This Bill was a simple measure of justice; it would be productive of good results; and they were determined to pass it into law. He believed. with his hon. and gallant, friend that if speeches on both sides were curtailed, there would be more time available for the consideration of details; but he would not join in the appeal to his Leader to extend the period mentioned in the Motion. The Opposition, in that case, would, like Oliver Twist, ask for more. Any man who had the love of Parliament at heart must regret when an occasion like the present arose; but, nevertheless, they should not be prevented from passing a measure which they believed to be just.

Mr. BRYCE said that although it was quite true that every additional day which might be given by the Government would pro tanto diminish the evil, still, that would not remove his objection to the Bill. The pitiable bleatings of hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House for an extension of the time to be allotted were indications of uneasy consciences. It might be necessary in certain circumstances to resort to such an expedient as closure by compartments, but the necessity had not arisen with the Licensing Bill. Much of the difficulty the Government had met with arose from mismanagement of business early in the session. On three conditions alone could such a Motion be justified. In the first place, there must be obstruction, and it had been admitted there had been none in the present case. The Prime Minister did not found his case on obstruction.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR said he had not mentioned obstruction, and in that he had followed the precedents of his predecessors.

Mr. BRYCE said Mr. Gladstone might not have used the word obstruction, but everybody would remember what took place in 1893, and his whole argument was directed to showing that, under the methods of opposition adopted, it would be impossible to get the Bill through.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: That is what I said.

Mr. BRYCE: The right hon. Gentleman did not say a single word against the method of discussion.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR said he had pointed out how the course followed made the passing of the Bill within a reasonable period practically impossible.

Mr. BRYCE said the right hon. Gentleman did not say there had been anything inconsistent with Parliamentary usage.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: Nor did Mr. Gladstone.

Mr. BRYCE said it would be a large order to attempt to quote what Mr. Gladstone said. Those who remembered the debates of the period would know that on every occasion every question, however remote, was used as far as possible by the skill and diligence of the Opposition. Nothing of the kind had happened on the present occasion, and 171 Amendments had been given notice of by Members on the other side, certainly not with any desire to defeat the Bill. It would have been quite possible to get the Bill through in spite of the many Amendments in a reasonable time, considering how many Amendments were repetition and how they crumpled up under the Chairman's ruling. He could say with some confidence that the discussion on this Bill had been eminently a businesslike discussion. During the thirty-four hours consumed on the Second Reading and in Committee 115 speeches had been made on his side of the House and 135 on the other side. Where there was no obstruction and no abuse of the Rules of the House, it became unfair and tyrannical to impose upon the House a Resolution of this kind. If they set up this precedent, whenever a Government had neglected to pass their legislation and to use their time in the earlier part of the session, they would have nothing to do but to come to the House and propose a drastic Resolution of this kind on the plea that they must carry their Bills before 15th August. The second condition was that there should have been adequate discussion. On that point he would only say that they had not got to the bottom of the principle on which compensation should be given, especially in the case of new licences; and if they stifled discussion on the principle on which taxation was to be imposed upon those licence-holders who would gain no benefit from the Government scheme they would leave behind a keen sense of injustice. The third condition was that the Bill should be one which the country did not disapprove of. The Government ought not to resort to an exceptionally severe process for putting a Bill through unless there was a reasonable moral certainty that the country was with them. They could not have more conclusive evidence than that afforded by a series of by-elections that the country was against this Bill and those who introduced it. The whole sentiment of the country, expressed in Petitions and public meetings, had been unequivocally against the Bill, and a large volume of the opinion of the clergy of the Church of England was also opposed to the Bill. The clergy of the Church of England did not regard this Bill as a great temperance measure. The right hon. Gentleman spoke of the Bill as a measure of eternal justice. Did eternal justice require double the value of the licensed premises? The right hon. Gentleman called the Bill a measure of great temperance reform. He could not forget that two years ago he told the House that the Education Bill was a great measure of educational reform. That was not now the opinion of the great majority in this country. If it were, the sooner the right hon. Gentleman gave them an opportunity of appealing to Cæsar the better. He would not speak of Party results, although he was bound to say that if they wanted something to use in a Party sense they could desire nothing better than that the Bill should be passed by closure by compartments.

Two results must follow from the methods which the Government had followed. In the first place it would destroy the moral authority which this Bill would have had when it became an Act. If the Government ignored public opinion, public opinion would ignore their work. Public opinion would not have any respect for Bills passed by tyrannical methods. In the second place, the Motion struck a blow at the House of Commons itself. The House of Commons was the mainspring of the Constitution in this country. It enjoyed immense power. It was not like Parliaments in other countries bound by a written Constitution. t had no check except that imposed by its own traditions and the feeling of protection it owed to the country; and, therefore, it ought to be especially careful of its power. If the British Parliament was more trusted than the Parliaments of other countries, if it was free from restrictions to which other Parliaments were subjected it was because the traditions of the House of Commons had won the confidence of the country and had made the people believe that that Assembly would not misuse the powers entrusted to it. The greatest of all reasons for that confidence was that the House had been allowed freedom of debate, and if the security for that freedom were once destroyed the confidence and authority which the House of Commons had hitherto enjoyed would inevitably be weakened. The solidity and strength of the Constitution of the country depended largely upon the existence of perfect confidence between the House of Commons and the people. The people ought to trust the House of Commons, and the House of Commons ought to feel that it would never go beyond what it believed to be the will of the people; but if a temporary majority were allowed to disregard the indications of public opinion, to silence the minority and to pass its measures without proper discussion, the relations which had so happily existed in the past would be destroyed. Within the last twenty-five years the House had suffered a great deal. It had declined from the freedom of debate, the openness of spirit, and the happy flexibility which its rules of procedure gave to it. No doubt a part of the alteration had been rendered necessary by the changes of time; but much more had been done than was needed, and no one had done more by his changes in the rules of procedure to injure the efficiency of the House of Commons than the right hon. Gentleman opposite. The present proposal would strike a further blow at the freedom and authority of the House of Commons—a blow which seemed to him to be the dernier ressort of Ministers who had got into a difficult position from which they were determined at all hazards to escape. It was an interference with the freedom of the House more violent and unjustifiable than had ever been made before, because it was the tyrannical exercise of power by a temporary and accidental majority.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): I am anxious to say a few words on this Resolution, because my Parliamentary experience is so long that I recollect perfectly every successful attempt which has been made during the last 30 years to abridge the liberties of free speech in this House. The only complaint I make of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Aberdeen, to a portion of which I listened, is that it is a mere repetition of speeches which have been made alternately from both sides of the House. Upon every occasion when this subject has been brought before us, those who were opposed to the Bill which was the subject of the Resolution have got up and said it was destroying the efficiency of the mother of parliaments, that it was striking a fatal blow at the liberties of the United Kingdom, and so forth. The most remarkable of these attempts in my opinion, was the closure upon the Home Rule Bill. I opposed that measure, with certain qualifications, on the ground that the particular Bill under discussion had not been sufficiently discussed. We have heard that in the course of the present argument. I also opposed it on the ground that the Bill was an exceptional Bill in this sense—that whereas all other Bills before the House of Commons can, after they have been passed, if they prove to be failures, be repealed and the mischief undone, that was a Bill which, for good or for evil, was irrevocable if once it was accepted. You cannot pass a great constitutional change of that kind with any expectation of being able to retrace your steps. But we have been reminded by the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down that it will be in the power of that Party, when they, as they not unnaturally hope shortly to do, occupy the Benches on this side of the House, to repeal this Bill if they then believe it is open to all the objections they now take to it. That constitutes, I think, a very important distinction between the Home Rule Bill and any other Bill that we have had subsequently to deal with. But, after all, I am perfectly prepared to admit that our action, on both sides of the House, in regard to this matter is actuated very largely by our Party sympathy and by our feeling in regard to the particular measure before the House. If we think the measure a good one we wish to see it carried and we wish to remove all the obstacles to its progress. If we think the measure a bad one we wish to kill it and we do not care by what means. I invite the House to consider the matter from that extremely practical and common sense point of view.

The right hon. Gentleman delivered a very confident opinion with regard to the merits of this measure and the opinion of the country upon it. I differ from him in both respects. I think I have taken a more active part than the right hon. Gentleman in temperance reform. My first considerable speech in this House, now some twenty-eight years ago, was made upon this subject, and I have not changed in the slightest degree the opinions I then expressed in regard to it. I have an intense sense of the importance of temperance reform, and it has always been a matter of the deepest regret to me that during all this period, and even for a longer period if we go back to the origin of temperance reform, practically nothing of substantial importance has been done by legislation. I believe that most of that is due to the extreme views of men whose honesty and whose conscientious convictions I recognise as much as I wish that others should my own, but who have absolutely refused to adopt that great principle in politics that half a loaf is better than no bread. They refused in the time before I was in the House of Commons to accept the great reform proposed by Mr. Bruce, who afterwards become Lord Aberdare, and they refused to accept the reform, which I always thought was of the greatest importance, proposed by Mr. Goschen, and they are now opposing with perfectly fanatical opposition this Bill, which in many very important particulars, although it may not go as far as they desire, is an enormous advance in the direction of temperance reform. Following the right hon. Gentleman, let me ask him to carry his memory back. What have we been urging during all this period? I accept him as a colleague in temperance reform. One of the things we have been urging is that it would be desirable to reduce the the number of licensed houses.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The right hon. Gentleman, although he says he is following the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Aberdeen, is doing something more. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Aberdeen did express an opinion that this Motion ought to be opposed on the ground that the Bill was not popular in the country, but the right hon. Gentleman is now going into the history of temperance legislation, which, I think, is beyond the Motion.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Mr. Speaker, I bow, as I always do, to your ruling, and your ruling prevents me from expressing, however, briefly, the reasons for my conviction that this Bill would be a great advance in temperance reform. At any rate, I may say this, that that is the honest conviction of many of us, who may perhaps agree with the right hon. Gentleman that the Bill does not go as far as it might go, but who would be glad to accept it for what it does actually give us, for the advance which we think it makes.

Then I come to the next point of the right hon. Gentleman, which is that this Bill is not popular in the country. He challenges us to test that by going to the country. Is the right hon. Gentleman prepared to assert when we go to the country that that is to be the issue? If it is we shall win. But if, on the contrary, it is "Chin, Chin, Chinaman," if it is "Do you wear a pig-tail?" then I really cannot say what result an appeal to the country upon that noble issue may produce. It is all very well to make these appeals to the country beforehand, these challenges, but I would remind the Committee of an occasion to which I have referred, when the closure was applied to the Home Rule Bill. I really do not recollect at this interval of time how the by-elections went on at that period, but I know we challenged the Government to dissolve on that particular issue. As a matter of fact, that was the issue at the election following, and we know the result, we know that the country gave a most distinct reply, and justified our opposition to the Home Rule Bill. That is in reply to these, I am perfectly prepared to admit, rather irrelevant matters I come back to the question of the closure as applied to a great Bill upon which there is difference of opinion. I say it is perfectly natural for hon. Gentlemen opposite to attempt to destroy the Bill, taking the view they do, and we on our side, who take a different view of the value of the Bill, are bound to do everything we can to carry it. But I would ask the right hon. Gentleman to consider what his great Leader said upon this subject in the course of those debates to which I have referred. Mr. Gladstone did not put the question of the closure upon the merits of the Home Rule Bill, but, curiously enough, not having the fears of the right hon. Gentleman as to the degradation of Parliament, he put it on the ground of the dignity and the efficiency of Parliament, and it is on that ground that I put the whole question to the House. I am looking, perhaps as one is accustomed to do as one grows older, a little more into the future than younger men need do, and I am not thinking so much of this Bill as I am thinking of the general principle --- how is the efficiency of Parliament to be preserved? What Mr. Gladstone said was that he regretted, and everyone believed him, to abridge the existing liberties of Parliament, but that he did so because without it the great foundations of its existence would be destroyed and the will of the majority would no longer prevail. Now there is a majority of Parliament, and—I take for granted the cheer which will follow this observation—there is a majority in the country, and the two may differ. But for the time, and whilst Parliament is sitting, our object as Members of Parliament should be to preserve Parliament as the representative, for the period, of the country, and to give to the majority of Parliament for the time being the weight that a majority ought always to have. That is a doctrine which I have always held, a doctrine which I have preached from time to time. The particular way of securing that the majority should prevail is, of course, a matter on which there may be difference of opinion.

Let me ask this: Which Party in the State has the greatest interest in this matter? I admit that there was a time when I thought the Liberal Party had the greatest interest in this principle, because I was brought up to think, and I thought, and I am not certain that it was not true, at any rate at that time, that it was to the Liberal Party that we were to look for social and legislative progress. Well, I very much doubt whether any impartial man can say that that is any longer the case. The Liberal Party has been engaged for a long time [OPPOSITION interruption]—I do not want to weary the House ["Go on"]—but I was rather anxious to clear the way for so nothing I have to say in reference to what I believe is the real issue at stake. What I was going to say was that the Liberal Party, as every Conservative would recognise, has had a great work to perform, and has performed it; but that in regard to another part of our legislative work—namely, the work of social reform—I do not say why, I am not speaking in a controversial sense, but it has happened that most of our social legislation has been brought forward and carried by the Conservative and Unionist Party. [OPPOSITION cries of "No."] I am not putting this forward as a Party argument, I am putting it forward to show that neither Party has any longer a special interest in preserving all the methods of obstruction. If there were a Party in this House, if the Conservative Party were a Party of pure reaction, of pure inactivity, of pure opposition to every reform, then it is they, not you, who would have a supreme interest in opposing every measure of closure, in opposing every restriction upon liberty of speech in this House. I say that is no longer the case, and, speaking to my friends around me, I say you have the same interest which those who call themselves the Party of progress have—I will not dispute it for the moment—in restoring and in increasing the efficiency of this House.

The efficiency of this House at this moment is nil. It is all very well to bring up these old arguments we have just heard from the Member for Aberdeen, which we of this Party produced at the time of the closure on the Home Rule Bill, and of every other closure. That is all leather and prunella. The real thing is that as long as we treat each of these questions separately of course we shall be divided into Parties. Those who oppose any particular Bill will be on one side and those who are in favour of it will be on the other. Cannot we take a wider view of the whole situation? Can we not consider the necessities of the time? Can we not see, without attributing any special dose of original sin either to one Party or the other, that circumstances have so far changed that, whereas in the time of Pitt and Fox there were at the very most but fifty Members of the House who ever addressed it, there are now 670 Gentleman every one of whom thinks, and no doubt with good reason, that he is as well entitled and as well able to address the House as anybody else? Can you not see that in these circumstances if every man claims his right each Party in turn will be paralysed, that each Party in turn will be unable to give effect to its principles and secure for them a fair trial? My desire is that when Gentlemen opposite come in they shall have the fullest opportunity of carrying out every promise they have made. I would like nothing better. In existing circumstances do they think that would be the case? We shall be rising—perhaps I myself shall be rising from the opposite side repeating the arguments of the Member for Aberdeen, and imploring the House to consider the dignity of Parliament, and I know not what, because I am opposed to a Bill to repeal the Bill which is now under the consideration of the House. Are we to go on for ever playing this purely partisan game on one side equally with the other? Are we to go on doing this without considering the situation to which we are reduced? I agree with Mr. Gladstone—[OPPOSITION laughter.] I do not understand hon. Gentleman who cheer ironically. I have quoted Mr. Gladstone. I agree entirely, and I always have agreed entirely, with what Mr. Gladstone said—namely, that the whole of this great constitutional system of ours, the existence of Parliament and everything else, is all machinery for securing peaceably that the will of the majority should prevail—the majority for the time. The business of the minority is to make itself into a majority and then in turn its will should prevail. Finally, we come to a state of things when what has been decided is accepted by both sides. But my real desire is that some measure should be devised which would give to each Party in turn—it is not, therefore, a partisan point—an opportunity of securing that the principles upon which it has gone to the country and secured the mandate of the country should prevail.

In my opinion our present system is unsatisfactory. At present, as I have said, each Party in turn resorts to this arbitrary method. When Gentlemen opposite are in power, it may be in a short time, they will have to resort to precisely the same measure and we shall oppose it. We shall say you are destroying the efficiency of Parliament. We shall say that it is tyranny of the worst kind; we shall challenge you to go to the country. We shall tell you that the people are against you. We shall say everything. We shall resort to every platitude and every commonplace which you have resorted to in the present debate. I know my observations will not have the slightest effect on the division to-night. It is not with that object that I am addressing them to the House. But I do think it desirable from time to time to recall the House to the fact that each Party in turn is paralysed under our present system, and that the time has come when both sides of the House if they were wise—not in a time of excitement like this, but in some more peaceable hours—would attempt to devise some system by which the time of Parliament, necessarily limited, should be distributed so that, although there should be a fair amount of discussion, no Bill proposed by the majority and supported by a sufficient majority should be killed merely by time. It is not necessary to make any charge of obstruction. To my mind it is absurd that any one should try to conceal the fact that he has obstructed. I have obstructed, you have obstructed, we have obstructed, and, if I may put it in the future tense, I will say we shall obstruct. Therefore, that is not a charge that is to be brought in by either side against the other. On the present case all I have to say is, believing as I do that this Bill is a measure of temperance reform, believing firmly as I do that, if we could take an issue upon this Bill alone, we should find that the majority of the people were entirely with us, and knowing as I do that, under the existing circumstances of the House, it cannot be carried without the closure, I shall vote most heartily for the Resolution.

*DR. MACNAMARA (Camberwell, N.) said the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham had told them that his first speech in the House was in favour of temperance reform. He had no doubt that it was a first-class speech, because that was in the right hon. Gentleman's Radical days. He fancied he remembered a notice in the Birmingham Daily Post of that time that Mr. Councillor Joseph Chamberlain, was to preside at a meeting to be addressed by Mr. George Trevelyan on the subject of the Local Veto Bill

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: My hon. friend will allow me to say that that is not a correct statement from my biography. I do not remember the Local Veto Bill. Mr. George Trevelyan did come down to address a meeting. But I was not councillor at the time; I was mayor

*DR. MACNAMARA said his recollection was that the object of the meeting was in support of the Local Veto Bill, but he might be wrong. At any rate he knew that the right hon. Gentleman had first said that if the Government of that day went to the country upon the Licensing Bill "We shall win." He distinctly remembered the right hon. Gentleman using that phrase. Now in detailing his policy at Greenock last Autumn the right hon. Gentleman said "On this we shall win." He did not know whether the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham was quite so sure about that to-day, but the sooner the Government took the verdict of the country upon it the better. There was one important feature which ought not to be lost sight of by the Prime Minister. On Friday last there were about twenty speeches delivered upon this Motion from both sides of the House and only three of them were in favour of it. There had also been twenty speeches that day, and again only three had been in favour of the Motion made by the Prime Minister. Upon this Motion the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham took up rather a detached position, and therefore he put him into a class by himself. He was glad to be able to say that he found himself in happy agreement with one thing which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham said. The right hon. Gentleman had asked them to remember what their great Leader Mr. Gladstone said upon the introduction of the closure on the 29th of June, 1893, on the Home Rule Bill. He would ask the right hon. Gentleman to remember what his Leader the present Prime Minister—he believed he was the right hon. Gentleman's Leader at the present time—had said. He said in 1893—

> "Whatever be the grounds for adopting this Resolution it is not one of necessity, but it is adopted upon the ground of expediency, and if I may say so, not of Parliamentary expediency but of Party expediency."

The Motion before the House had been introduced for the very same reason. On the same occasion the Prime Minister complained very bitterly of the manner in which Mr. Gladstone had frittered away the early part of the session of 1893, and the right hon. Gentleman protested against the Government coming down at the beginning of July and asking the House to leave undiscussed the most vital provisions of the Home Rule Bill. He endorsed those views to-day. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham said that circumstances altered cases, and the Prime Minister had told them that they must take each of these cases upon its merits. They could not do that upon the present occasion because this case had no merits. With regard to the Resolution of the Prime Minister, two painful considerations filled his mind. The first was that the Prime Minister, who should be the guardian of the liberties, privileges, and functions of Parliament, had ostentatiously raised indifference—indeed, he might go the length of saying contempt—for the deliberations of Parliament to a fine art. The second deplorable circumstance was that the Prime Minister had signally failed to utilise the enormous gifts and opportunities which had been placed at his disposal. Here was a man of unique intellectual distinction, who had behind him an unrivalled Parliamentary majority, docile and willing to do what he pleased, and that man, who with the gifts which God had bestowed upon him might have written his name on the scroll of honour for some great work in the uplifting of the people and in the improvement of their social and moral well-being, had elected deliberately to be remembered by this Motion on behalf of this Bill. There was no censure which he could pass upon that action more bitter than the private censure which the right hon. Gentleman must ultimately pass himself, unspoken, on his own conduct.

MR. BOUSFIELD (Hackney, N) said that this Bill was one which hon. Gentlemen opposite had declared they would resist by every means in their power, and they were using the Committee stage for the purpose of defeating and destroying this measure. He was one of those who desired to see the Bill amended in important particulars, but he was not going to play the game of hon. Members opposite and use the Committee stage for the purpose of defeating the Bill. It would not be consistent with the honour and dignity of this House to allow the Committee stage of a Bill to be used for that purpose, because it would render their proceedings entirely nugatory. It seemed to him that one thing they had to consider was how much time they could allot to the consideration of this measure. The Amendment which had been proposed raised a question of principle, and therefore the Government were right in allotting the proper proportion of the time at their disposal to this measure. From the point of view of the business men in this House, to whom it was absolutely necessary that the length of the session should be confined within reasonable limits, the only business-like course for the House to adopt was to mark out the amount of time which the House could spend upon this particular measure.

*MR. WINSTON CHURCHILL (Oldham) said he was sure that everybody, without distinction of Party, would be glad to see the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham in his place again. He was particularly glad to see him, because the right hon. Gentleman and himself were to a certain extent in the same boat. He wanted to see that Government turned out and go to the country; so did the right hon. Gentleman. [MINISTERIAL cries of "Oh."] The only difference between them was that he was able to express his opinion, and the right hon. Gentleman was for the present dissembling his. [MINISTERIAL cries of "Oh."] He thought the right hon. Gentleman had given a very odd reason why those who were opposed to this measure and other measures which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham would like to introduce should support the proposal which had been made by the Prime Minister. He had pointed out that the Conservative Party in the past had always been opposed to these violent methods of procedure, and that the Liberal Party had always been in favour of them. Now he said there had been a change, and he declared that on both sides they had definite positive ambitions to carry out which he suggested could only be carried out at the expense of their ordinary Parliamentary procedure. When he thought of some of the ambitious schemes which the right hon. Gentleman desired to carry he was not inclined to vote for making procedure much more drastic by the hope and belief that the present proposal might some day be imitated by the right hon. Gentleman in order to carry the tariff proposals which he had submitted t the country. [MINISTERIAL cries of: "Oh, oh" and "Divide."] He quite agreed with the right hon. Gentleman's foresight in this matter, because nobody could imagine how he could carry his tariff proposals without mutilating the procedure of the House of Commons.

This debate had provided them with a very excellent specimen of the Prime Minister's dialectical methods, for he was making a very important Motion, and asking the House to make a most momentous departure. This Motion had been the subject of a large amount of criticism from this side of the House and also from the Ministerial side, and in reply to that criticism the Prime Minister had made a fascinating speech which did not contain any justification of his proposal, but which was full of all sorts of animadversions upon precedents from other Governments established under totally different circumstances at other times. He would not delay the House by endeavouring to trace the resemblances between the procedure the Prime Minister had now adopted and the procedure which the last Liberal Administration adopted. It was true that there were points of resemblance between the procedure on the Evicted Tenants Bill and that which they were now asked to adopt. The principal point of resemblance was that both procedures were proposed as rather desperate measures by Governments in extremely difficult circumstances, on the eve of a dissolution which was to be followed by an election extremely disastrous to them. He could quite understand that some right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Opposition Bench had been a little embarrassed by the resemblance which might be traced between those two occasions, but that did not help the case of the Prime Minister. The right hon. Gentleman could not quote the precedents which had been referred to with any satisfaction, because no man had denounced with more vigour and sincerity the procedure which was adopted on those occasions. The House had to consider, in the first place, the situation and the causes leading to the present proposal, and, in the second place, whether it was, in fact, a reasonable thing to compress the proceedings in Committee on the Licensing Bill into six days. The hon. Member for Spen Valley, in his speech on Friday, went so far as to say that it would be ludicrous to attempt to discuss this Bill upon the time table which the Prime Minister proposed under this Motion, and the right hon Gentleman the Member for Montrose went further and said it would be a farce to discuss all the complicated provisions of this Bill within the six days provided by this time table. No one surely would deny that such a discussion, under such circumstances, so mutilated, so restricted, so arbitrarily curtailed, would be valueless and a useless waste of time. If that were so, he was astonished at the Prime Minister's moderation, because if he intended to pass this Bill without going through the formality of a Committee stage he wondered that the Prime Minister had allowed even six days. He would say to the Prime Minister, what the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham had no doubt often said to him in private, "Why not go the whole hog ?'

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I did not hear the hon. Gentleman exactly. Do I understand that he is quoting to the House something which he says I said to him in private ?

*MR. WINSTON CHURCHILL said he was venturing to address an argument to the Prime Minister, who was not there, but would perhaps see it in the usual way, and asking him why he should take six days over this mutilated discussion upon this Bill in Committee, why not go the whole hog ? He suggested that as advice which the right hon. Gentleman might have addressed to the Prime Minister at some time or other. He might as well be hanged for a sheep as a lamb; why not one day, one division, or, if it be thought right, why not take it without a division ? What was to be gained by this "purposeless discussion" ? Every argument he had used to justify this proposal would justify the much more convenient course he had just suggested. Nothing was gained, but something was lost. Candour was lost. Five days of Parliamentary time were lost which might be occupied in discussing some of those interesting questions which the House was prevented from discussing by blocking Motions. They might discuss Army reform, or take up the Prime Minister's vote of confidence in himself as an Amendment to what he was entitled to call the Black Resolution. He could only see one conceivable advantage the Prime Minister had to gain by the elaborate procedure he had adopted. He wanted to keep up appearances, to make the country treat the Bill as if discussed, to invest arbitrary and unconstitutional procedure with a sort of sham decorum. This desire to keep up appearances at all costs was very curious. He would venture to repeat a story he heard the other day. The editor of a newspaper in the Western States of America received a letter one morning from a man whose acquaintance he had the privilege of enjoying, which began as follows—

> "Dear Sir,—I regret to inform you that last night I had an altercation with Mr. Dawkins of this city, in the course of which I shot and killed him."

[MINISTERIAL cries of "Oh" and "Divide."] He claimed the same courtesy that had been extended to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham. [Renewed MINISTERIAL interruptions.]

MR. FLAVIN (Kerry, N): You have got to listen to it whether you like it or not. The hon. Member for Oldham is not on your side now.

*MR. WINSTON CHURCHILL said he did not wish to weary hon. Members opposite and he had no desire to continue his story if they did not wish to hear it. [OPPOSITION cries of "Go on" and "Why not ?" and MINISTERIALIST cries of "Divide."] It was quite obvious that the amenities of debate could not be indulged in by anyone who had differed from colleagues on the Ministerial Benches. since all courtesy, chivalry, and even ordinary fair play were thus refused—thus ill-naturedly refused. He would confine himself strictly to the argument. He could understand the desire of the Prime Minister to invest his proceedings with a certain air of formality, but he asked why should the Opposition join in what the right hon. Member for Montrose described, and what could only be called, a dismal farce, the whole object of which was to delude the country into the belief that the Bill had been adequately discussed, to invoke the authority of the House of Commons for a piece of legislation which was nothing less than an act of Executive usurpation. It took a great Party to govern Great Britain by Parliamentary methods. One man might do it by unparliamentary methods. It was only when something had occurred to weaken the central principle, the inner life, of a Party that some particular interest in that Party laid hold of the machinery and mechanism of Government and used it to further its own special interests without regard to the welfare of the country as a whole. He thought those who had listened to the debates during the past few days must have noticed a more bitter element in them than had marked the ordinary discussions in this House They had been grappling with a great trust. They were face to face with a great commercial organisation mobilised for the effective purposes of political warfare. They had seen it thrust its greedy fingers down the back of the Treasury Bench and pull the coat tails of Ministers, and when they reflected that the Prime Minister was dependent for his return to the House upon the votes of a certain class of liquor-sellers in his constituency [MINISTERIAL cries of "No, no" and "Withdraw," and cheers.]

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member has not committed any breach of order.

*MR. WINSTON CHURCHILL said they had realised what it meant to fight against a great commercial combination which took a prominent part in political action, and the reflection occurred to hon. Members when they saw this great trust in working order, "Thank God, there is only one of them at present that we have to face. We have only one now, but when the Birmingham golden age is ushered in——"

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is now travelling beyond the Motion.

*MR. WINSTON CHURCHILL, continuing, said the Prime Minister had been largely responsible for the present situation. It was undoubtedly the case that the right hon. Gentleman had led the House by different methods to those of some of his predecessors. If there was some matter the House was anxious to discuss, on which the conduct of the Government was impeached, the Prime Minister did not prepare an elaborate answer to the charges. No, he put down a blocking Motion. [OPPOSITION cheers and MINISTERIAL cries of "No."]

*MR. SPEAKER: The Prime Minister's action with regard to that, even if the hon. Member is correct, is one of those past actions of the Government which cannot have contributed to produce this Motion, and cannot now be commented upon.

*MR. WINSTON CHURCHILL said it was very difficult to bring any point within the Rules of debate in the face of such interruptions. [MINISTERIAL cries of "Divide."]

MR. SHACKLETON (Lancashire, Clitheroe): Mr. Speaker, I rise to order. For the last ten minutes I have been endeavouring to listen to the speech of the hon. Member, and I have been unable to follow him. I think it is one of the privileges every hon. Member is entitled to that he should be heard. [Cries of "Order."] I do ask you, as Speaker of this House, to try to keep order for us. [Cries of "Oh, oh" and "Order."]

*MR. SPEAKER: It is impossible for the Speaker to compel every Member to keep silence, but I trust every hon. Member will observe the Rules of the House.

*MR. WINSTON CHURCHILL, speaking amid continued interruptions, said it would not have been strange if, when the House of Commons was unable to discuss the great question of the day, there should have been a resort to the rough-and-ready method of obstruction. But the Prime Minister had not alleged that there had been obstruction. The rights of the minority, he ventured to suggest to hon. Members opposite, were rights which they would perhaps have need to consider in days that were not far distant. He saw the Prime Minister in his place. Was it to be supposed that he was a consenting party to this uproar? [Cries of "Order."]

*MR. SPEAKER: I cannot, of course, compel the silence of every hon. Member of this House, but I would remind them that the Orders of this House as they existed more than 250 years ago make it the duty of every Member to maintain silence whilst a Member is addressing the House. No Speaker can enforce that regulation, but I appeal to the House whether it is not more conducive to the dignity of the House when a Member is speaking, whether his opinions be popular or not, that he should be allowed to proceed.

SIR GEORGE BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I wish to ask, as a point of order, whether we have not the right to show our dissent from strong personal attacks made on the Leader of the House.

*MR. SPEAKER: Personal attacks, so far as they are orderly, ought to be borne without disorderly interruption.

*MR. WINSTON CHURCHILL said he was quite at a loss to deal with these interruptions, differing as they did from those which took place at public meetings, the authors of them not being amenable to argument or appeals for fair play. But he did not desire to detain the House long. The right hon. Gentleman had said that the legislative programme of the session was not extensive. Surely it was very remarkable that he had not been able to carry out the ordinary legislative programme by ordinary Parliamentary methods. The cause which had brought about the Parliamentary breakdown did not lie on the Benches of the Opposition, but on the Benches of the other side; and what they had witnessed that night was only another element in the demoralisation which had taken place in the great Conservative Party, a demoralisation which made Members perfectly willing to come down to shout down an unpopular speaker, perfectly willing to be in their places when the liberties of the House of Commons were to be voted away, but not willing, as the hon. Member for Spen Valley had said, to forsake their dinner, not willing to forego the pleasures of Ascot, or to sit in the House later than 15th August. He had finished the observations which he desired to make, and he was bound to say that he appealed to the good sense of the House of Commons to say whether he had received fair treatment—[Cheers and cries of "Divide"]—whether the carefully-organised attack upon the liberties of debate in which the right hon. Member for West Birmingham was an accomplice and a consenting party — [Loud cries of "Order," "Withdraw," and cheers]——

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN said, Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. [Cries of "No" and interruption.] I merely wish to know, Sir, whether it is in order [interuption and cries of "Order"] for the junior Member for Oldham to say that there is a conspiracy against him in which I am an accomplice—a statement which is absolutely untrue. [Cries of "Oh" and "Order" and cheers and counter-cheers.]

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member should not make charges of that kind. [Cheers and cries of "Withdraw."]

*MR. WINSTON CHURCHILL, who was again received with cries of "Withdraw," said: Mr. Speaker, if I have said anything which passes in any degree the limitations of the order of debate [cries of "Order" and "Withdraw"] I completely withdraw it. I have made my protest which I venture to commit to the good sense and calmer consideration of the House.

*MR. CATHCART WASON (Orkney and Shetland), who spoke amid noise and interruption, said he was only going to say a few sentences. He was endeavouring to make his voice heard hundreds of miles beyond this House. The question now before the House was, in his opinion, one of the most important that had ever been submitted to any Parliament. They had long been accustomed in this country to point the finger of scorn at the ways of Tammany. They had been educated to jeer at the struggles of candidates for the Presidency of South American republics to secure place and power and profit for themselves. But surely the degradation of the House of Commons, the Mother of Parliaments, had reached full measure when hon. Members were brought here to vote closure by compartments on a Bill of such importance as this. In connection with Home Rule there was no question of this or that company's shares going up or down. During the discussion of this Bill the House had presented a deplorable spectacle. More than once a representative of the great brewing interest had been seen hanging over and directing the Premier of this country as to how he was to act, and they had had the same hon. Gentleman in the lobbies telling hon. Members how they were to vote. That was a humiliating position for Members of the House of Commons to be placed in. The people of the country were entitled to have some knowledge of the character of the legislation proposed, but this had been denied to them in respect of this measure at any rate. The Government did not seem to understand their own minds. In the course of the discussion which had taken place on the Bill it had been shown that the Prime Minister and the Home Secretary did not understand the real character of the Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER said the hon. Member must confine himself to the question before the House.

*Mr. CATHCART WASON said he only wanted to show that the Prime Minister and the Home Secretary did not understand the Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER: That is not the point now before the House.

*Mr. CATHCART WASON: May I allude to this point. The hon. Member for Tunbridge Wells moved an Amendment, and the Solicitor-General promised to give consideration to the point raised——

Mr. SPEAKER: It is not in order for the hon. Member to refer to discussions that took place on Amendments.

*Mr. CATHCART WASON said he only wished to allude to the matters to show the imbecility of the Government in regard to their own Bill. If this Bill were submitted to the constituencies in its nakedness and baldness it would be scouted from John O' Groats to Land's End. He would venture to make an appeal to hon. Members opposite with regard to the effect this measure would have on the social welfare of the people of the country. There was not a single day when millions of the King's subjects did not pray to the Almighty Father not to lead them into temptation. It was the duty of an Assembly like this to help the people, and to prevent them so far as possible from being led into temptation. That end would not be promoted by the passing of this Bill.

Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs): In the few words it will be my duty to address to the House I shall endeavour to follow the good example propounded and exhibited by the Leader of the House on Friday when he introduced his Motion. He said that he would avoid saying anything which might add to the excitement which very naturally prevailed on such an occasion. I think that is the duty of all Members of the House at this time, perhaps in a larger degree than in the case of some others on the part of those who have some authority over individual sections of the House. It is not that I do not feel strongly the nature of the Vote that is going to be taken and the effect of it, as I believe, upon the general estimate by the world of this House and its deliberations; but above all things let us do what we have to do with dignity and in order. If I try to avoid saying anything of an irritating character, though one cannot altogether avoid controversial topics, I trust that my efforts will be responded to by hon. Members opposite. My intention is perhaps rather ambitious; it is to say something new, or at all events to bring the House back to the argument the Leader of the House used when he proposed this Motion. We have had a pretty full discussion on the general question of these Motions, their nature, their use, and their abuse. We have had instances drawn from previous occasions fully analysed and discussed, and we have had all the influence that can be brought to bear on the mind of anyone going to vote in relation to the Bill itself and its position in Committee at this moment; but I am going to take up the plea on which the right hon. Gentleman founded this Motion. He based his case for guillotining the Bill on the first clause on the time and the business of the session; he challenged examination of the course of business during the session and a comparison with other sessions; in fact, his case was practically a vote of censure on the Opposition; and from that point of view I will make a few observations. He said—

> "If the House insists on spending night after night in criticism the time given to legislation must be curtailed."

Before Easter, he said, one afternoon only was given to legislation. Again, he says—

> "I say, and say emphatically, if you are going to allow the Government"— but who does he mean by "you"? I thought the Government were in charge of business—

> "If you are going to allow the Government to have one afternoon before Easter and seven between Easter and Whitsuntide, you are making an apportionment of time which is not enough for legislation and too much for criticism."

But my answer is, it is not we who made the apportionment of time, it is he. He then went on to challenge a comparison between this session and other sessions, and this challenge I reply to. It involves not the merits of this particular Bill, not the question what may be the demand for the Bill or the effects that may result from it not passing; we hear very little of that part of the case, for, indeed, there is no demand. As has been pointed out, petitions—which after all are an old-fashioned way of testing public opinion somewhat fallen into discredit and disuse of late years—petitions have been all on one side, there being but a solitary one on the other. For myself I have, since the Bill was introduced, received copies of 4,000 resolutions passed at public meetings and by public bodies in opposition to the Bill, and as these Resolutions were accompanied by an intimation that copies had been sent to the Prime Minister, the right hon. Gentleman must be equally well aware of the state of public opinion. There is nothing connected with the Bill, or the feeling of the country towards it, its urgency or its necessity, in the case of the right hon. Gentleman; but that the business of the session, including the proceedings on this Bill, would have been in an advanced and favourable position if the disposition of the Government had not been thwarted and brought to confusion by the Opposition—that is the case upon which I am challenged. I am very glad to look into it and I will tell the House what I find. I find so far has it been from the fact that an exaggerated amount of time has been occupied with criticism during the session, the time so occupied has been relatively and absolutely insufficient. To begin with, let us consider this—was there reason for criticism, was there more or less ground for it this session? The occasion for it was unprecedented, just as the measures adopted for closing the mouth of the House of Commons were also beyond precedent. The Government were unable to settle their own policy in regard to two of the most important questions before us—namely, the fiscal question and the Army question. With regard to the public service, they were spending money like water without producing any justification. They are still groping about for the true function of the Army. No one has found it except the Secretary of State for War, who tells us that he feels, and knows, and sees exactly what ought to be done. Then why does he not tell us what ought to be done? That would save a great deal of the time of the Government, and would have saved a still larger amount of time if it had been done two or three months ago. Then, with regard to the Navy, a great deal of time has been spent in reconciling a two-Power standard of strength with three and a half-Power standard of expenditure. Then there are blunders like the Somaliland campaign, and such incidents as the adventure of the peaceful Mission to Tibet and the importation of Chinese labour. [MINISTERIAL cries of "Oh."] I am analysing the causes, and I am within my right. The real matter for criticism, however, is the presence of the right hon. Gentleman on that Bench, notwithstanding that they have lost, as we say and as they can hardly deny, the confidence of the country and also their due authority in this House. Look at their position. They are a band of fiscal reformers reduced to positive incoherence the moment any one gets up and tries to explain his views. That furnishes ground for criticism for nearly a whole session.

I have been speaking of the necessity, or excuse, or reason for criticism. Now let us come to the dimensions of it. One day has been allowed to a vote of censure on Chinese labour. Three Motions for the Adjournment of the House have been made from the Opposition Benches and two from the Government Benches. And these are the only inroads that have been made upon Government time. There have been private Motions possibly, but they have been in private Members' time. Let me dissect the session. Eighty-two days up to and including last Friday—the very number of days spent on the Home Rule Bill in Committee when strong measures were taken in 1892–93—eighty-two days have been at the disposal of the Government in whole or in part for their business. Of these two whole days and three evenings were devoted to criticism outside the usual routine in the way I have spoken of. Is it claimed that the vote of censure was wantonly or unnecessarily moved? No, Sir. The amendment of the Finance Bill took two days. Is this complained of? The two days spent on the consideration of the Finance Bill were just as much a part of the legislative work of the session as the days spent on the Licensing Bill itself. There was the usual debate on the Address, of which no complaint was made by right hon. Gentlemen. Two days of it were spent in discussing "the grave negligence and mismanagement of the Ministry, whereby the duration, magnitude, and cost of the war were greatly increased." That was the Motion of my hon. and learned friend the Member for South Shields. Was two days too long for a Motion of that importance, founded upon the Report of the Commission on the War, which had attracted universal attention and excited strong feeling in the country? At any rate, the Government and the late Colonial Secretary made two interesting contributions to that debate. They did not appear to resent it, but were rather glad of the opportunity of defending themselves. Two days were given to Chinese labour on the understanding laid down by the Government that this would be the only opportunity before the Ordinance took effect. Six days were spent in the forlorn hope of endeavouring to piece together into an intelligible and authoritative shape the conflicting and irreconcilable views of the distracted colleagues of the Prime Minister on the fiscal reform question. Was that time wasted? In one sense I admit it was wasted, because we did not succeed, after all, in arriving at a knowledge of what their policy was. That was not our fault. The reason of it was that a great question was suddenly and rashly raised and that the Government were found, after all, to have not only unsettled convictions, but conflicting and irreconcilable opinions. The natural consequence of that state of things was the occupation of a great part of Parliamentary time. But let me follow the time-table. There were fourteen days on the Address, three days on votes of censure, and three evenings on adjournments. That is twenty days, which leaves the Prime Minister sixty-two days, in whole or part, for Supply or legislation. Of these, four days, the same which he allows for the consideration in Committee of this most complicated and far-reaching Bill, were spent on the Supplementary Estimates, which the Government themselves introduced, which were on a scale absolutely without parallel and which really constituted, for the Army and Navy, a sort of new Army and Navy Budget. There were no obstructive tactics here. Is the right hon. Gentleman satisfied that the conduct of this Army business has been such as to disarm criticism? The time so spent was given to the country. If time was wasted it was owing to the manner in which information was either communicated in some part to, or withheld in the greatest part from, the House. The Licensing Bill could have been introduced before Easter, if it was ready, but it was evidently not ready. Six Bills came before the House—the Labourers (Ireland) Bill, Police Superannuation, Scotch Education, Penal Servitude, Aliens, and Dogs, those twin measures which seem to be complementary to each other, treating the dog as an alien and treating the alien as a dog. There was also a Bishopric Bill, and there was an innocent and uncontroversial Bill, which has yet to come on, called the Local Authorities (Default) Bill. But how absurd to charge the Opposition with bringing about a waste of time, or at any rate such an expenditure of time as leads to a deadlock and makes closure by compartments on a Bill of first-class importance necessary, when dogs and aliens, bishops and Irish labourers, convicts, Scotch schools, and policemen were given priority! And when the Bill had got into Committee on 6th June, as we all remember, progress was suspended in order that stalwarts of the Government should be able to go to Ascot, and then, a little further on, it was again suspended in order that the tobacco trade should be able to recover from the confusion into which the Government had plunged it.

The Prime Minister has invited this scrutiny which I have given of the mode in which he has managed and distributed the time of the House. Is he proud of this leisurely, dilettante, haphazard conduct of business, with here a little and there a little, a nibble at this and then a bite at that? I do not think the record has been satisfactory, for that is not the way to force along business. The Government started with several episodes in their external policy which seemed to be incredible—at least, we cannot obtain from them a clear explanation or intelligible excuse—and with a great domestic revolution, for it is nothing less, put forward without rhyme or reason, on which they do not know their own mind. And then they complain, having begun in this way and having gone floundering and blundering along in the way I have described, forsooth, to the House and say that it is we who have driven them to the strong measures now to be employed. The whole responsibility is laid on the Opposition, and we are told that the credit of Parliament will be destroyed unless this measure, profoundly distasteful to at least very large sections of the people of this country, unheard of when the Government were put in power, unthought of even two years ago when they were dealing with this question of licensing, and on which we have just raised enough of the curtain in the few days that the Bill was in Committee to see how complex and serious are the questions it involves—that Parliament is to be discredited unless it is forced through this House without Amendment. The Government even this very day have put a number of new Amendments on the Paper in explanation of their views. I repudiate the responsibility the Government seek to put on us. It is not we who have allowed this or allowed that. It is the right hon. Gentleman who has managed the business of the House in a way which has led to this necessity. If this Bill had been a measure which we thought would be a good one, one likely to accomplish its object, and one which the people of this country desired, even then it would have been a strong order to invite us to treat a measure of that kind in this way. When, however, it is a Bill which we think will be disastrous to the country in its present shape, a Bill that will require immediate Amendment by Parliament, if it is passed, when opportunity offers—when that is the kind of Bill then, of course, we oppose this proceeding with the utmost willingness and with all the strength we possess. I have endeavoured to meet the right hon. Gentleman's plea, not, I can well imagine, to his satisfaction, but, at any rate, to the information of a good many people who heard the plea urged—and when that plea which he has put forward is so wrapt up in his own conduct of the business of the House we are entitled to explain to the country that we have no art nor part in this proceeding, and shall discharge our duty in voting against the Motion he has brought forward. This proceeding, while it will do no credit either to the Government which proposes it, or the Parliament which adopts it, will also tend to strengthen the public opinion as to the reputation of the Government in whose favour it is made.

Mr. BELL (Derby) said he did not think any one in this House could charge him with having obstructed the Government in any debate. During the discussion he had got up on several occasions but was unsuccessful in catching the eye of either the Speaker or the Chairman of Committees. He had not complained of that, because in most instances some one else had spoken what was in his mind. But he could not allow this Motion to go by without expressing, during the few minutes at his disposal, his opinion, humble as it might be, but which he knew had the support of his constituents. He had always held in great esteem the Prime Minister, and believed the right hon. Gentleman to be a man of great sincerity, although he had not always agreed with him in all the right hon. Gentleman had said and done. But that conviction had been dispelled out of his mind, because he really believed that the right hon. Gentleman was not sincere in thrusting this Bill down the throats of the hon. Members and the country. [MINISTERIAL cries of "Oh, oh!"] Hon. Members might dissent, but he had a right to enjoy his opinion as they had theirs. He felt strongly on this question. While this was a Bill to compensate brewers for putting arsenic in their beer, it made no provision to give compensation to those who were poisoned by drinking their beer. The number of days and hours set apart for the Bill was certainly, in his opinion, insufficient to adequately discuss a measure of this magnitude and importance. He agreed with the right hon. Member for West Birmingham for once, that when he was on that side of the House in opposition, and the Liberals were in power, if the Liberal Party adopted such a monstrous proposal as this, he would join with the right hon. Member for West Birmingham in opposing it. At any rate, in the experience he had had, he had never known any Party, either Tory or Liberal, to have done anything of this kind in thrusting a Bill of this character down the throats of hon. Members with insufficient discussion. He wanted to make it distinctly clear that he would only be a passive resister that night, and should vote against the closure; but he would become a very active resister after that night and should take no part in closure by compartments. [MINISTERIAL interruptions and cries of "Oh, oh!"] He did not say that with a view of convincing hon. Members opposite, because many of them were convinced of the advantages of a Bill which would put money into their own pockets. [MINISTERIAL ironical laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen might laugh, but he had his convictions, and he hoped he understood a little bit, as well as some people who were interested, what the position really was. He had listened to a great many debates in this House, and he recognised that it was sometimes necessary to have the closure, but only after some reasonable time had been given to the discussion of the point at issue. But insufficient time had been given for the discussion of this Bill, and whatever might be the consequences he would not allow the closure by compartments to be enforced without some active resistance, and he hoped they would let the country know that there were some persons in this House who had some regard to the dignity of Parliament. The Prime Minister had reduced the House to a very undignified position.

And, it being midnight, Mr. SPEAKER proceeded to interrupt the business.

Whereupon Mr. A. J. BALFOUR rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

AYES.

RAILWAYS (PRIVATE SIDINGS) BILL.

[SECOND READING.]

LORD WOLVERTON: My Lords, this is a very short Bill containing only two clauses, and it has passed through all its stages in the other House. The general idea of the Bill is to put back the law into the position which we always thought it occupied. It has always been considered that it was the law that facilities should be granted by the railway companies to traders and others owning private sidings. This idea has been rather rudely shaken by two decisions of the Courts in England and Scotland, and this Bill has been framed to put back the law into the position which we considered it previously occupied.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."—(Lord Wolverton.)

On Question, Bill read 2^a, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House, on Friday next.

HALL-MARKING OF FOREIGN PLATE BILL.

[SECOND READING.]

THE EARL OF LYTTON: My Lords, I need detain your Lordships but a very few moments in explaining this Bill. Its object briefly is to secure that the mark which is required by the existing law to be placed upon all articles of gold and silver plate imported from foreign countries shall be of so distinctive a character as to fulfil the purposes which it was originally intended to serve. A casual glance at this Bill might perhaps lead some of your Lordships to imagine that it was an attempt to give some advantage to British over foreign-made plate. Such an opinion as that would be altogether erroneous. The Bill, it is true, has the support of, and is, indeed, largely promoted by the traders of Birmingham and Sheffield; but, nevertheless, it has no connection, however remote, with the now famous fiscal policy of Birmingham, or even with the milder, though not less famous, policy of Sheffield. If it had, I should not now be asking your Lordships to give it a Second Reading.

The law at the present moment is as follows. By an Act of Parliament passed in the year 1876 all gold and silver plate which is imported from foreign countries, and which is taken to an assay office to be stamped, has placed upon it the letter F in an oval shield to denote that it is of foreign origin. The Act which enforces this regulation distinctly laid down the objects for impressing this letter. It was stated that the object was to denote that such gold and silver plate was imported from foreign ports, and not wrought or made in the United Kingdom. But this letter

F has not been found to be sufficiently distinctive in character, because it is very easily confused with either the initial of the manufacturer of the plate, or even with the letter which denotes the year in which the plate was marked. Your Lordships will know that there are letters frequently placed upon gold and silver plate; this letter F is very easily confused with one of those letters, and the hall-mark which is placed upon articles of plate and was originally intended merely to denote the quality of the plate, has now been generally looked upon as an indication of British manufacture. The result of this is that large quantities of gold and silver plate of foreign origin have been imported into this country, and having received an hall-mark at an Assay Office in this country, have been sold in this country, and even exported to other countries and there sold, as plate of British manufacture. In other words, my Lords, the object of the Act of 1876 has not been carried out, and it is the intention of this Bill to remedy that particular matter.

There is no new principle involved in this Bill. No plate which is not obliged to be marked at present will have to receive a mark in future. In fact, the only result of the passing of this Bill will be that what has in the past been done inadequately will in the future be done adequately. The precise mark which in future is to be placed upon imported gold and silver plate is to be decided by an Order in Council, because it is a very technical matter, and no doubt the decision will ultimately be arrived at after consultation with the Assay officers and the members of the trade. One word as to the history of the Bill. The Bill was introduced last year into the House of Commons, and in March of that year a very large and influential deputation, representing the traders of London, Birmingham, and Sheffield, waited upon the President of the Board of Trade to urge its claims. The principle was accepted by the Government, and the Bill has since been redrafted under the direct supervision of the Board of Trade. It has been introduced into the House of Commons again this year, and has passed through all its stages, and in its present form it receives the support of all the members engaged in the gold and silver trade in this country. The Association of Chambers of Commerce has passed a resolution in its favour, as also have the trades unions in this country. In fact, the Bill has the support both of the masters and of the men. In those circumstances I feel sure your Lordships will not hesitate to read it a second time.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."—(The Earl of Lytton.)

On Question, Bill read 2^a, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Friday next.

YEOMANRY WEAPONS.

LORD ASHBURTON: My Lords, I rise to ask the Under-Secretary of State for War whether in deciding upon a second weapon for the Yeomanry regiments due consideration will be given to the fact that, while fully armed for fighting on foot, they require a weapon for use when mounted and carrying out the work of scouting and patrolling, in the execution of which they would be liable to sudden attack by those of the enemy's forces engaged in the same duties.

I have to ask your Lordships' indulgence on rising to address the House for the first time. About six weeks ago a Question was asked relating to the Yeomanry by a noble Lord who served with great distinction in South Africa, and who is now in command of one of the newly raised Scottish Yeomanry regiments. Out of that Question a somewhat long debate arose, in which the necessity for a second weapon for the Yeomanry was freely mentioned. I think the consensus of opinion in your Lordships' House was entirely in favour of such a weapon. I cannot help thinking at the same time that the main factor in deciding what that weapon should be was rather overlooked. The Yeomanry are now, like the Regular cavalry, trained to fight on foot, and for their foot work they cannot want a better weapon than the one they have got—the long-range magazine rifle. But they are taught other duties which I venture to think are even more important than their foot work—namely, those of scouting and patrolling.

The Yeomanry, though they are now a kind of mounted rifles, described by Sir John French as a "form of cavalry," are in reality, I think, the cavalry of the Auxiliary Forces, and on them, whenever the time should come for our Militia and infantry to be placed on the footing of active service, much of the scouting and patrolling would fall. If that patrolling is to be of the kind described by the present Inspector-General of Cavalry in India as "Blind-man's-dog scouting," then it is a waste of time to have it; but if, on the other hand, the scouting and patrolling is to be efficiently carried out, it will carry with it not the risk but the certainty of frequent hostile collisions with small bodies of the enemy. We cannot hope, I suppose, for the second time to be fighting a nation who will have no weapon except the rifle. You may take it for granted that whenever we are at war again the enemy's scouting will be done by men armed with other weapons than the rifle. In a wooded country the land lends itself to such fights; they will be short, and, if the Yeomanry are left as they are at present, I do not see what they can be expected to do.

It is now nearly three years since the war ended, and the Yeomanry are in just the same position as they were then. They have only one weapon. When the noble and gallant Earl the late Commander-in-Chief spoke in the debate to which I refer, he told your Lordships that he was unable to remember why the issue of bayonets was discontinued to the Yeomanry. I think I may say with some confidence that 90 per cent. of the Yeomanry are deeply grateful to the person or the circumstances that caused that issue to cease, for a more unpopular weapon I do not think you could devise for the Yeomanry, and at the same time it would be an absolutely useless weapon. If it comes to bayonet work such as we have heard of in Manchuria, you cannot expect dismounted cavalry to compete with infantry. Masses of Yeomanry on foot would have very short shrift at the hands of trained infantry.

The noble and gallant Earl seemed to be in favour of bayonets and against swords, but I should like to suggest that there are swords and swords. I am no advocate of the present sword. It is an ill-balanced weapon, it has a cutting edge, and it requires no little skill to properly handle. It has the great disadvantage of requiring a considerable amount of instruction and an enormous amount of practice before a man can even be considered a fair swordsman; but because this particular type of sword is not a satisfactory one I fail to see that it is beyond the powers of the military authorities to design a weapon which, while being perfectly efficient, would be much simplified, and the use of which would be more easily acquired, The weapon that would be an ideal one for the Yeomanry would be one about the length, perhaps a trifle longer, of the present naval cutlass without a cutting edge and merely a point, but with the same hilt. It would only require very simple sword exercise, and if the Yeomanry were armed with such a weapon and with the rifle they have now they would be sufficiently armed for any work they might be called upon to do, I see no objection, if necessary, why that weapon should not be able to be fixed on the end of the rifle, provided that such means of attachment in no way interfered with its efficient use as a weapon for unmounted fighting for which it would, of course, be specially designed.

The amount of dissatisfaction that exists in the Yeomanry now on the subject of their armament and equipment, I do not think is realised in quarters where it would be well that it should be. In common with many other Yeomanry officers, I attach very serious importance to our half-armed condition at present, and I hope the noble Earl the Under-Secretary of State for War will be able to give some assurance that the question of the helpless condition of the Yeomanry will receive that consideration at the hands of the authorities which I venture to think it deserves; and that no attempt will be made to turn the Yeomanry into a miserably bad mounted infantry by forcing that unpopular weapon, the bayonet, upon them.

LORD WILLOUGHBY DE BROKE: My Lords, I desire to associate myself with the remarks which have just fallen from the noble Lord. I was one of those who were very pleased to hear, in the course of the debate the other day, that the Yeomanry were going to be armed with a second weapon, but I must confess to a certain amount of alarm when I heard that it was going to take the shape of the bayonet, and for the same reason which the noble Lord has just brought forward. I should like, as a humble member of the Yeomanry, to join him in requesting the noble Earl the Under-Secretary to favourably consider the sword in preference to the bayonet. I venture to submit that the bayonet is not a weapon which can be used by a man on horseback. We were also told during the course of the debate on the Yeomanry not very long ago that the Yeomanry were not primarily intended for service abroad, and that in the event of invasion, which I suppose is improbable, their principal use would be in this country. I venture to submit that for a mounted man a sword in his hand would be a very much more useful weapon than anything else.

It may be urged against the use of the sword by Yeomanry regiments that we should not have time to learn the sword exercise. Well, my Lords, in the old days before the Boer War, and before our swords were taken away from us, we used to cut the sword exercise. It was cut, you will say, with a blunt-edged weapon, but still the sword exercise was learnt with a considerable degree of efficiency, and I should like to call your attention to the fact that we now have almost three times the amount of training that we had before. We have fourteen working days in camp, and each officer and each man in our regiment, at any rate, attended five preliminary mounted drills before the Yeomanry assembled in camp. Therefore, I think we should have plenty of time in which to learn at any rate a modified form of the sword exercises. I should also like to ask the noble Earl the Under-Secretary if he could give us some kind of assurance as to the position as a mounted force that the Yeomanry are going to occupy, whether we are to be cavalry or mounted infantry, or something between the two.

It may be that different conditions of service may be suitable to different regiments. For instance, Lord Lovat's Scouts may possibly desire to be treated as mounted infantry, although I cannot speak for them. But there are certain Midland regiments which have always been cavalry ever since they were started, and which could produce a squadron of at least 100 or 120 men accustomed to ride across country, who I venture to assert would be quite equal to undertaking any of the functions of a cavalry regiment. The whole essence of these Midland regiments, is, in the first instance, their cavalry character. There are officers and men in those regiments who would never have dreamt of joining the Militia or Volunteers, but who joined the Yeomanry because it was mainly connected with horsemanship and riding, and because there was a prospect of doing the work mounted. For that reason I sincerely trust nothing more will be done to diminish the cavalry character of such regiments. I should like to respectfully assure the noble Earl that any attempt to whittle away the cavalry character of these regiments will be most unpopular with all ranks.

*THE EARL OF LONSDALE: My Lords, I do not wish to detain the House for many minutes, but on an occasion like this, when the weapon of the Yeomanry is concerned, I cannot refrain from asking your Lordships, as an Officer-in-Command of Yeomanry, to do all in your power to prevent the introduction of such a weapon as the bayonet into the Yeomanry. Anyone who is accustomed to the use of the rifle knows the absolute balance in its use, and anybody understanding horsemanship must realise that no one, however fine a horseman he may be, is capable of using a rifle with a bayonet attached to the end of it when it comes to lungeing. In fact I very much doubt if even a Sandow could use it. We have seen contests at various military competitions — sword versus lance, sword versus bayonet – but I do not know if any of your Lordships have ever witnessed a competition as between a rifle with a bayonet attached to it and a sword, the mounted competitor having the rifle. I have seen it twice, and each time it has ended in serious discomfort to the horseman, for it is absolutely impossible after lungeing for him to recover himself, and a defy even a Sandow to manipulate a horse with a rifle, having a bayonet at the end of it, in his hand. When the whole secret of Yeomanry and Cavalry is dependent on the absolute balance of the man, whatever his weapon may be, with a view of remaining fixed in the saddle, it is obvious that such a weapon would be most prejudicial to Yeomanry, and it is for this reason I ask your Lordships to persuade the authorities not to introduce the bayonet as a second weapon into the Yeomanry.

THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (The Earl of DONOUGHMORE): My Lords, I think your Lordships will have gathered from the character of the debate that I am not being asked by the three noble Lords who have addressed your Lordships to give a final decision on this subject to-night. The matter is under consideration. In fact, I spent some time discussing it with three of my colleagues this morning, and I can assure your Lordships that it has not been lost sight of. I hope a decision will be announced in another place at an early date. I can only repeat what I have said before. Although the three noble Lords who have addressed your Lordships this evening advocated the same view, I am sure your Lordships will admit that there are very many different opinions as to what the second arm for the Yeomanry should be. I addressed your Lordships at some length on that point the other day in the debate initiated by Lord Lovat, and I do not intend to repeat the arguments I then tried to lay before your Lordships. All sorts of weapons have been recommended to us, and all sorts of variations of every weapon have been recommended, and I sincerely hope we may be able to hit upon something which will be satisfactory, if not to all parties, at any rate to most parties, and I can assure the noble Lord who raised this question to-day that we are very anxious to come to a final settlement upon the point.

I now come to the point raised by the noble Lord on the Cross Benches (Lord Willoughby de Broke). He is extremely anxious that nothing should be done, more especially in connection with the corps in the Midlands, to decrease what he calls their cavalry character. I can assure the noble Lord that we have no intention of any action that could lead to that end. Your Lordships will, of course, understand that there are town corps and country corps of Yeomanry. The country corps generally consist of good riders, and not very good shots, when they are recruits, and the town corps generally consist of not very good riders and not very good shots, but still, as a rule, their shooting is better than their riding when they first come; and our desire is to train these two classes to reach as high a standard as they possibly can in both these considerations. Our efforts naturally in the country corps are concentrated more on rifle shooting than on riding, and vice versa.

LORD TWEEDMOUTH: My Lords, it may seem somewhat presumptuous in me to interpose in this discussion in a House where so many of your Lordships are professionally acquainted with the matter before us, but I do think this House will be doing a good service in turning its attention for a short time this evening to this question of how you are going to arm your mounted troops in the future, and how those arms are to be carried. For my own part, I quite agree with what has fallen from the noble Lords who have spoken, that as a weapon for mounted men the bayonet is ridiculous. It is all very well to have a bayonet, no doubt, for a man to use if he is acting as an infantry soldier, but it is ridiculous to say that a bayonet can be of any use to a man on horseback. I have seen a very ingenious invention by which the great part of the stock of the rifle was cut away in order that the man might get a better grip of the rifle and use it at arm's length as a lance, but I agree that it would require a Sandow to use a weapon of that sort with any success.

The question we have to consider is, is it not right that mounted men, now that they are used so very much in a double capacity, sometimes on horseback and sometimes on foot, should at least have one weapon suitable for each position? I think most people will agree to that, and I think that the idea which we sometimes see portrayed in the illustrated papers, of a gallant mounted infantryman galloping full speed, with his reins loose on the horse's neck and his rifle up to his shoulder taking aim, is quite impossible in modern warfare. It is possible to use the carbine on horseback, but if it is to be used effectively it must be sufficiently short to be used in one hand as a pistol. I remember many years ago, when there were still buffalo in the United States, that I killed a number of buffalo with a carbine used in that way; it is far better than any revolver that was ever invented. What is the weapon you are going to give to your mounted man? The two suggested are the lance and the sword. It seems to me that directly you give your mounted man a rifle the question of a lance drops out, because I do not see how a man can carry a rifle and a lance as well. Therefore, you are tied up at once to the sword. I believe that the sword should be such an one as Lord Ashburton suggested, and that it should be attached to the saddle so that it should be essentially a weapon which the man would rely upon on horseback to use from the horse.

Then we come to the question of the rifle and how it is to be carried. It seems to me one of the most extraordinary incidents of the whole of the rearmament of our forces that a shortened rifle should have been adopted for the purpose of being handed to every mounted man—for that was the object of shortening the rifle—and that the manufacture of hundreds of thousands of shortened rifles should have been entered upon before any decision had been come to as to the manner in which that rifle was to be carried on horseback. All sorts of methods have been tried. A very distinguished general officer at Aldershot told me the other day that they were at their wits' ends to find a way of carrying this new rifle on horseback, and I have seen a number of the new rifles that have been so carried very much damaged by the operation. My Aldershot friend leans to carrying the rifle in a bucket on the saddle in the same way as the old carbine was carried, but that is not so easily done. Noble Lords who have tried it will not have found it so easy as in the case of the old carbine, and, if you fix your rifle in a bucket on the saddle, then, supposing your man is dismounted, both his sword and his rifle are left on the saddle, and he is without any arm at all.

I think a method of carrying the rifle or carbine should be decided upon which would allow of its being attached to the man, so that when he is dismounted he has a weapon with him, and that weapon the one which it is most convenient for him to use when on foot. I have another witness to call with regard to the question of carrying the rifle. A very capable cavalry officer writes to me—

> "We have not yet discovered how we are to carry the new rifle. We have been supplied with shoes to fit on the saddle, but the rifle is too short to carry with the sling and shoe."

I understood that that was the great object of shortening the rifle, that you were to be able to carry it with a lance attachment and in a lance shoe. The extraordinary result of shortening the rifle has been that you cannot carry it in this way because the rifle is too short. This officer continues—

> "I hear the cavalry at Aldershot are carrying them slung on their backs with their butt in the shoe, which must be very dangerous and uncomfortable. They complain of having lost a lot of bolts. A bucket to carry the new rifle is too clumsy for words."

My point is that it is an extraordinary thing that you should invent a new rifle for the express purpose of supplying to the cavalry, that you should shorten your rifle throughout the whole British Army and re-issue it to the cavalry, without making up your minds in which way it is to be carried by horsemen. I think the House may well give a little more time to this question, and I hope the result will be that our mounted men may be given an arm suitable to be used on horseback and another arm to be used on foot, and that both may be carried in a convenient way for man and beast.

*EARL ROBERTS: My Lords, as I have had something to say on this question of the rifle, the sword, and the bayonet, perhaps it will not be out of place if I make a few remarks on this occasion. When we went to South Africa the cavalry were armed with the carbine and sword or lance, as the case might be, or both. A very short time after I arrived out there I received a request from the officer commanding the 18th Hussars asking that his men should be given the rifle. He said that the carbine was practically useless against the Boer Mauser, and he hoped that his regiment might be given rifles. I was able to meet the request, and in a very short time all the other officers commanding cavalry regiments followed this officer's example and begged that their men should be given rifles too. Consequently rifles were given to them. I cannot understand how, if the cavalry found the carbine useless when on service, anyone can possibly propose that they should be armed with it now.

Before the war began a Committee was sitting to see whether the existing rifle could not be made a little handier for general purposes by being made lighter and a little shorter. That Committee did not conclude its proceedings until the war was over, but when I came back to England I remembered that the cavalry had all begged they might have the rifle. It seemed that if this proposal, which had been made before the war began, that the rifle should be shortened could be carried out, it would be as well to have a rifle which would do for infantry and cavalry alike. That was the origin of the shorter rifle. It is as effective in every respect as the long one; it has the advantage of being 5-in. shorter and a pound lighter; and for cavalry purposes, therefore, it is more convenient. As to the question of how the rifle should be carried, the carbine has now a sling attached to it, so that it can be worn across a man's shoulders when on service. It is, of course, only on service that it is necessary that it should be thus carried, but, as the noble Lord has said, it is then essential.

In Afghanistan on one occasion I had about two squadrons of the 9th Lancers numbering about 195 men, and on 11th December, 1879, when we were fighting beyond Kabul, the 9th Lancers were a great deal engaged, and lost a great many horses and a fair number of men. But what surprised me was to find that they had lost more than forty carbines. On inquiry I found that this was due to the fact that the carbine was carried in the bucket, and that when the horse was shot and fell over the weapon was lost. I saw many of the men on foot in this predicament, their sword was dangling between their legs, their lance was in their hands, and they were trying to recover the carbine from the horse. I immediately gave orders that the swords should be attached to the saddle, and that the carbine should be carried on the trooper's back. That did not find favour for many years in this country, and has not up to the present moment; but I believe that it is now to be settled that the carbine shall be carried in the bucket in peace time and in a sling across the back in war time. The proper place for the sword is, no doubt, on the saddle. I would observe, however, that, if the Yeomanry are given the sword, it is essential that they should learn how to use it. I remember hearing a story in the war of some Yeomanry who were chasing a Boer. They overtook him, and the Boer fell down, and they began to slash at him with their swords. Not very much damage was done, and one officer said, "Shoot the poor devil." Then the Boer, who said nothing so long as they merely hacked at him with their swords, called out, "Don't shoot me, Sir." When they proposed to shoot him he begged for his life. Therefore, if the Yeomanry are given swords they should know how to use them, and unless they have sufficient time to learn their use it would be no good giving them swords. I only made these observations in order to tell your Lordships why the cavalry are now given the rifle and why it is difficult to give the sword to men unless they learn how to use it.

THE CHINESE IN THE TRANSVAAL.

Lord COLERIDGE: My Lords, I desire to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies how many Chinese labourers of those hitherto imported into South Africa under the Chinese Labour Importation Ordinance can demand the importation of wife or children, under Clause 33 of the Regulations, and the numbers of such wives and children respectively. I would only remind the noble Duke that it was a week ago that he promised me this information. He said he would telegraph to Hong-kong to obtain it. I refrain from making any observations until I have heard the answer of my noble friend.

The UNDER-SECRETARY of STATE for the COLONIES (The Duke of Marlborough): My Lords, I do not think I need detain your Lordships more than a minute or two in replying to the Question of the noble and learned Lord. As the noble and learned Lord has reminded us, on 28th June he asked me to find out from Hong-kong the number of Chinese labourers who had registered their wives and families. In pursuance of my promise to the noble and learned Lord a telegram was sent off on the 29th ultimo to the Acting Governor of Hong-kong, and the reply we have received from him is to this effect, that out of the first batch of Chinese who went over to South Africa on the "Tweeddale," which I think had on board nearly 1,000, 308 had registered their names as being anxious to have their wives and families sent out to them; that is to say, over a third of the total number in the first ship registered their names and will be able to have their wives and families sent over to them at some future date. I think, in view of this fact, that the doubts and misgivings which I detected in the mind of the noble and learned Lord on the last occasion the subject was mentioned must be entirely removed.

House adjourned at twenty minutes past Five o'clock, to Thursday next, half-past Ten o'clock.

ELECTRIC LIGHTING PROVISIONAL ORDERS (No. 5) BILL.

Return presented, relative thereto [ordered 4th July; Mr. Bonar Law]; to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [No. 239.]

Admiralty Shipbuilding Programme—Balance of Orders.

MR. J. F. HOPE (Sheffield, Brightside): To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether the orders for the balance of the amount required for the ships of last year's programme have yet been given out.

(Answered by Mr. Pretyman.) The reply to the hon. Member's Question is in the negative; but the invitations to tender will be issued this week, and it is expected that all the orders will be placed by the end of this month.

Pension of William Welsford, Devonport Shipwright.

MR. KEARLEY (Devonport): To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether he is able to state the reason why William Welsford, shipwright, His Majesty's Dockyard, Devonport, has not been assigned his pension under the Workmen's Compensation Act, seeing that he is permanently and totally disabled, and that his injury was sustained more than a year ago.

(Answered by Mr. Pretyman.) On the 13th January last, Welsford was granted a pension of £38 14s. 3d. for life in respect of his service, and on 13th February an allowance of £27 12s. 1d. (10s. 7d. a week) for one year as compensation for injury. These allowances are not, as a rule, granted permanently in the first instance, but are reviewed after a sufficient interval has elapsed to allow of the real effects of the injury being ascertained. The compensation allowance in this case dates from November, 1903, Welsford having received hurt pay up to that date. He has been informed that his case will be further considered at the expiration of the present award when, if his disablement is found to be permanent and total, he will receive compensation accordingly.

Chairman of an Urban District Council--Powers of Voting.

MR. PARROTT (Yorkshire, W.R., Normanton): To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether that Board has had occasion to consider whether or no the chairman of an urban district council, elected from outside the council, has an original as well as a casting vote; and what conclusion the Local Government Board has come to thereon.

(Answered by Mr. Walter Long.) The Question has been considered on several occasions, and the view taken by the Department has been that in the circumstances mentioned the chairman of an urban district council has an original as well as a casting vote.

Purchase of Estates in Sligo by the Congested Districts Board.

MR. O'DOWD (Sligo, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will give the names of the two estates recently purchased by the Congested Districts Board in Sligo for resale to tenants; also the acreage of tenanted and untenanted land; the amount of purchase money gross rental; and number of years purchase paid the landlord in each case.

Name of Estate.	Acreage of land.		Purchase money.	Rental of tenanted land.	Poor Law Valuation of entire estate.	Number of years purchase of the valuation.

Cost of Collection of Taxes in Ireland.

MR. LOUGH (Islington, W.) To ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the whole of the expenditure of £246,000, shown in the Treasury Return issued the 4th of July, 1903 as the cost of the collection of taxes in Ireland, is incurred in that country, and how the total is made up, setting out the details of £66,000 for Customs and the £180,000 for Inland Revenue separately.

(Answered by Mr. Victor Cavendish.)

Customs.

The sum of £66,000 is made up as follows:—

(a) £47,000 for effective Services, representing the actual cost of the Customs Staff in Ireland;

(b) £5,000 for general superintending Staff and Law Charges (Salaries);

(c) £14,000 for general non-effective Services (Superannuations).

The two sums (b) and (c) were not actually incurred in Ireland, but they represent the Irish share of these general charges which are divided, for the purposes of the Annual Return, between England, Scotland, and Ireland in the ratio of the amounts of revenue collected in each country.

Inland Revenue.

The approximate net cost of the collection of Inland Revenue Taxes in Ireland for the year 1902–3 was as follows:—

Salaries, Wages, etc. - - - -	125,000
Poundage to Collectors of Income-tax and Copies of Poor Rates	15,600
Salaries, etc. to Distributors of Stamps - - - - - - - -	2,500
Non-effective Charges (Pensions, etc.) - - - - - - - - -	26,000
Other Charges (Travelling, Postage, Carriage, Law Expenses, Rewards, etc.) - - - - -	12,700
Deduct:
Appropriations in Aid (Law Costs and Penalties recovered, etc.) -	1,300
	180,500

The whole of this expenditure was incurred in Ireland.

Issue of South African Clasps to Yeomanry.

SIR. CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean): To ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office how it comes that correspondence is still going on with regard to the issue of South African clasps in cases where it is admitted that Yeomanry privates are entitled to them, but that the date of issue is not yet fixed; and whether steps will be taken to put an end to the delay.

(Answered by Mr. Bromley Davenport.) Correspondence is still going on as owing to the mass of rolls to be checked it has not yet been found possible to complete all issues. The delay has been due to the supplementary rolls required for the extra clasps granted in October, 1902; 122 extra clasp Yeomanry rolls have been dealt with and the remainder will, it is hoped, be soon cleared off. It must be pointed out that 1,458,440 clasps in all have been issued up to date.

Religious Instruction in Non-Provided Schools.

MR. H. C. RICHARDS (Finsbury E.): To ask the Secretary to the Board of Education upon what date and in what manner he proposes to communicate to the House and to the managers of non-provided schools the instructions which have been given to His Majesty's inspectors, not to sanction time-tables in Church of England schools where provision is made for the attendance of children with their parents' consent at such services; and if the Board of Education intend to treat the time-tables of the Roman Catholic schools in the same manner.

(Answered by Sir William Anson.) The Board have decided that, as the instructions to be given to their inspectors in the matter referred to in the Question relate to an interpretation of the Education Acts on a particular point, which is of some general interest, they will make the said instructions public. It is hoped that they will be issued very shortly. The action of the Board turns upon the interpretation of the Education Acts, and I am not aware that these afford preferential treatment to one kind of voluntary schools over another.

Fees for Medical Men called in by the Police.

DR. AMBROSE (Mayo, W.): To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to complaints made by medical practitioners within the Metropolitan area of the inadequacy of the fees paid by the police for medical services, and the difficulty and expense incurred before obtaining those fees; and, if so, whether, in view of the time involved in these police calls, which are generally cases of injury or poisoning, he can arrange that the fees shall be increased and shall be paid on demand at the local police station from which a medical man is called.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Akers-Douglas.) This matter has not yet come before me, but I understand that the Commissioner of Police has received representations with regard to the amount of certain fees paid by the police for medical services, and that these representations are now receiving his consideration.

Bunker Capacity of "Scout" Class of Boat—Maintenance of Speed.

SIR JOHN COLOMB (Great Yarmouth): To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether he can state what is the average bunker capacity of the "Scout" class; and whether it is contemplated that these vessels will be able to maintain a sea-speed of 25 knots when loaded to that capacity.

SIR JOHN COLOMB: To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether the coal capacity at load draught of the "Scout" class is correctly stated in the Navy Estimates this year, pp. 225 and 227, at 150 tons; and, if so, whether these vessels will be required to attain a speed of 25 knots at the contractor's trials when loaded with sufficient coal for 3,000 miles at 10 knots.

(Answered by Mr. Pretyman.) The average bunker capacity of the "Scout" class is 485 tons. The sea speed expected from these vessels when loaded to their full capacity, carrying 485 tons, is not 25 knots, but 24·6 knots, and this speed will increase as the coal is expended. I regret that there was an inaccuracy in my statement to the House of Commons on this subject on Thursday last, as I find that only half and not the full amount of coal required for steaming 3,000 miles at 10 knots is required to be carried on full speed contractors' trials, and this amount does not differ materially from the 150 tons mentioned in the Estimates, and quoted in the recent article in The Times.

Customs Duty on Tobacco Strips.

MR. CHARLES MCARTHUR (Liverpool, Exchange): To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will furnish an estimate of the amount of Customs duty which will, according to the proposed differential duties on tobacco, be payable per pound on imported strips and on strips produced from imported leaf by stripping in this country, respectively, instancing the case of Bright Virginia, and giving the grounds of his estimate.

(Answered by Mr. Austen Chamberlain.) According to the proposed differential duties on tobacco it is estimated that the Customs duty paid on a pound of imported strips of Bright Virginia tobacco will be 3s. 3d., and on a pound of strips produced from imported Bright Virginia leaf by stripping in this country will be approximately 3s. 4d. The appended calculation, together with explanatory notes, shows the grounds on which the estimate is based.

Explanatory Notes.

In the above table no allowance has been made for loss of material involved in the operation of stripping.

(a) These figures represent averages of four samples of Bright Virginia whole leaf as analysed at the Government Laboratory.

(b) Two weeks allowed as a fair average for stripping 100 lbs. of this class of tobacco. The interest is calculated on the £15 of duty paid by importer. Three weeks allowed for depositing analysing stalks, and waiting to receive the rebate thereon. The interest is calculated on the £2 17s. 10d. rebate paid.

(c) Having regard to the increased quantity of leaf tobacco to be stored, the attendant heavier charges for storage and handling, the additional insurance, licence duty, waste, etc., the sum of ½d. per lb. is a fair one to allow for contingencies.

(d) Calculated thus—

	Imported strips.
Average moisture . .	13·50%
Average sand . .	2·08%
Total .	15·58
Absolutely dry and sandless	84·42
Total .	100·00

Virginian leaf consists of—

19·43	of stalks containing moisture	16·95%
80·57	of strips containing moisture=12·55 lbs. moisture	15·58%
Total 100·00		15·85%

Average sand found by analysis in Virginian stalk=2·87%.

As the sand naturally adhering to the stalk will receive the rebate of 3s. 1d. per lb., this sand should be deducted thus:—

	lbs.
Sand on 100 lbs. leaf . . =	6·12
	5·57 = sand left in 80·57 lbs. of strips produced in this country or lost on stripping.
Total sand and moisture on 80·57 lbs. of strips . . =	18·12
Dry sandless tobacco . . =	62·45
Total .	80·57

Therefore 62·45 lbs. of dry sandless tobacco represents 73·97 lbs. of strips.

(e) These 73·97 lbs. of strips contain 2·08% sand the same as imported strips, therefore 2·08% of 73·97 lbs. = 1·53 lbs. This deducted from 5·57 lbs.—the total quantity of sand present in 80·57 lbs.—leaves 4·04 lbs.

(f) Total moisture in 80·57 strips produced in this country . . . =	12·55
Average moisture imported strips=13·50% and 13·50% of 73·97 of net strips produced . =	9·99

Income of Teacher of Ballynaclosha National School.

Mr. P. A. McHUGH (Leitrim, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in accordance with the recognised principle of special consideration in special circumstances, he will request the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland to revise the figures on which the present income of the principal teacher of Ballynaclosha National School was fixed; is he aware that in fixing this teachers' income no allowance was made by the Commissioners for the fact that owing to the prevalence of disease in his district in 1898 and 1899 his income fell considerably below the figure at which it stood before these years; and will he see that this teacher is not penalised through a misfortune which he had no power to avert.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) I answered a similar Question yesterday by the hon. Member for West Kerry.†

Contribution by Irish National Teachers to Upkeep of Schools.

Mr. P. A. McHUGH: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can grant a Return showing the amount contributed by the National Teachers of Ireland during the five years ended 31st March, 1904, towards the equipment and general upkeep of their schools.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) The Commissioners have no materials from which they could furnish this Return.

Burtonport Railway Agreement.

Mr. McFADDEN (Donegal, E.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in view of the charges made by William H. Boyd, D.L., Ballymacool, Letterkenny, as to unauthorised changes made by the solicitor to the Lough Swilly Railway Company in the draft making agreement between the Board of Works and the railway company for the making of the Burtonport Railway, a direction will be given to the Board of Works to publish the whole of the correspondence between the Board's solicitor and the solicitor of the Lough Swilly Railway Company as to the agreement entered into for making the Burtonport Railway.

† See page 449.

Ballinascarthy and Timoleague Light Railway.

MR. MCFADDEN : To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the county council of the county of Cork took over the making of the Ballinascarthy and Timoleague Light Railway in the year 1902, and have since the 31st December, 1902, declined to levy a rate to pay the shareholders the dividend on the 5 per cent. county guarantee of the company, and, if so, the reason of the refusal; whether any steps have been taken to prosecute the late secretary of the company for misappropriation of the sum of £500 drawn by him out of the company's funds in the Munster and Leinster Bank; and whether any proceedings were taken by the county council against the bank for the recovery of the said sum of £500.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) By Order of His Excellency the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, dated 7th July, 1896, the Ballinascarthy and Timoleague Railway was vested in a committee of management of the county council. No application has been made by the county council for the Treasury recoupment of two per cent. on the dividend for the half-year ended 30th June, 1903. I am unable to give any further information.

Longford Drainage.

MR. J. P. FARRELL (Longford, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the attention of the Commissioners of Works in Ireland has been called to the failure of the Longford District Drainage Board to drain the tributary from Mullagharowmeen to the Camlin River which, owing to its neglected condition, is flooding the lands of the riparian occupiers; and, if not, will attention now be directed to it.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) No representations to this effect have been recently made to the Commissioners of Public Works. The trustees of the drainage district are responsible for the maintenance of the drainage works in good order. Complaints of neglect should be made in the first instance to the trustees through their secretary. If complaints so made are without effect, a complaint would then properly lie to the Commissioners.

Deportation to Longford of English and Scotch Paupers.

MR. J. P. FARRELL : To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland to state by what authority pauper inmates of English and Scotch unions have recently been deported to Longford Union; and will an inquiry be made as to whether the provisions of the Act passed to prevent such deportation have been complied with.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) The attention of the Local Government Board has not been called to any recent case of deportation of English or Scotch paupers to the Longford Union. If any specific instance is brought under the notice of the Board, in which it is alleged that the law has been violated, it will investigate the matter.

Money for Donegal under the Marine Works Act.

MR. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether any arrangement has yet been arrived at between the Irish Government and the Donegal County Council as to the allocation of the money ear-marked for the county of Donegal under the Marine Works Act; and, if so, what works do the Government propose to carry out under the Act, and the sums of money they intend to spend on each.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) Works have been approved at Gortnasate at an expenditure of £5,000, of which £4,480 will be provided under the Marine Works Act, £500 by the Congested Districts Board, and £20 from local sources. On the 27th June the County Council forwarded the necessary resolutions with respect to works proposed at Portnoo, Cladnageragh, and Downing's Bay. These resolutions are at present before the Commissioners of Public Works for report. An expenditure of £3,000 is contemplated at Portnoo out of funds provided by the Marine Works Act, £1,500 at Cladnageragh, and £4,500 at Downing's Bay. The Congested Districts Board will also make a contribution in each case.

MR. O'DOHERTY: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the attention of the Congested Districts Board, and of the Irish Government, has been called to the necessity for the construction of a sea wall and boat slip at Portasantal, Glengad, county Donegal; whether the fishery experts of the Board are of opinion that the proposed work would be of utility to the fishermen of the district, and save them labour and loss in the discharge of fish from their boats and the beaching thereof; and whether a grant will be made for this purpose out of the moneys voted by Parliament under the Marine Works Act.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) The attention of the Congested Districts Board has been directed to the requirements of the fishermen at this place. There are no funds available for undertaking the proposed works there under the Act of 1902.

Expenditure from Army Votes on Brennan Torpedo Establishments.

SIR JOHN COLOMB: To ask the Secretary of State for War whether he can state what, if any, portion of the £32,000 expenditure out of Army Votes for 1903–4 upon Brennan torpedo establishments is for interest upon the capital expenditure upon them of £483,000.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Arnold-Forster.) No portion of this sum of £32,000 was for interest on the capital expenditure of £483,000.

Terms of Retirement of Paymasters of Army Pay Department.

MR. MOON (St. Pancras, N.): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether, in view of the changes now taking place in the Army Finance Department, he proposes to offer special terms of retirement, as has been done under similar circumstances in the past, to chief paymasters and staff paymasters of the Army Pay Department, who might elect to retire in preference to serving under new conditions.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Arnold-Forster.) The scheme for the formation of the Army Accounts Branch is at present under consideration, and I regret that I am, therefore, unable to make any announcement on the subject of the retirement of officials at the present time.

Sale of Government Stores by Colonel Morgan in South Africa.

MR. CHARLES HOBHOUSE (Bristol, E): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether he has yet received any answer to his inquiry as to the sale of Government stores in South Africa by Colonel Morgan, of the Army Service Corps.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Arnold-Forster.) A report on this subject has just been received from the General Officer Commanding in South Africa, but, in view of the fact that Colonel Morgan has instituted proceedings against the London newspaper which commented on the remarks made by the Chief Justice of the Transvaal in connection with this matter, no action will be taken by the War Office until the case is decided in Court.

Cost of Report of Army Medical Department—Delay in Publication.

MR. CHARLES HOBHOUSE: To ask the Secretary of State for War what is the cost of preparing the Annual Report of the Army Medical Department; at what date the Report is generally presented; what is the cause of the delay in its presentation to Parliament; and whether it would be possible to expedite it in future.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Arnold-Forster.) The cost of the printing and paper of the Army Medical Department Report falls upon the Stationery Office Votes. It naturally depends on the size of the Report, but I have ascertained that the cost of the Report recently published may be taken as about £180. The Report is generally presented eighteen months after the year to which the Returns refer. It was explained to the hon. Member last year, in reply to a Question, that many of the Returns do not reach this country till the late autumn, owing to the labour of compilation, and that a considerable period is required for the elaboration of the Report from these Returns. I am afraid, therefore, that it is not practicable to expedite its publication.

Resolutions of Inter-Colonial Council as to Railway Administration in South Africa.

MR. BUCHANAN (Perthshire, E.): To ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies what were the resolutions finally arrived at by the Inter-Colonial Council for the improvement of railway administration and securing a stricter financial control; whether they have been accepted by Lord Milner and the Government; and whether in consequence it will be necessary to alter the Orders in Council.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Lyttelton.) I have not yet received from Lord Milner the final proceedings of the Inter-Colonial Council on this subject. Lord Milner has informed me by telegraph that he will submit to me shortly his proposals arising out of those proceedings.

QUESTIONS IN THE HOUSE.

Flogging in the Navy.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether, in accordance with the King's Regulations, official patterns of canes and birches are kept in the home dockyards for comparison in the purchase at these dockyards of canes and birches supplied to the ships of the Royal Navy and naval training ships for the flogging of boys and youths under eighteen, in these ships; whether specimens of the canes and birches thus approved will be produced by the Admiralty for the inspection of Members of the House of Commons.

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. PRETYMAN, Suffolk, Woodbridge): The reply to the first part of the Question is in the affirmative, and to the second part in the negative.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Can we not see these tools, as approved by the Admiralty.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member is not entitled to ask whether they will be produced.

MR. FLAVIN (Kerry, N.): Will the hon. Gentleman place a sample of the canes in the tea room.

Caning Statistics in the Navy.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty on how many boys in the years 1901, 1902 and 1903, were canings inflicted on ships of the Royal Navy and naval training ships; if there is any return of the number of canings inflicted and the offences for which this punishment was awarded.

MR. PRETYMAN: There is no such Return as that mentioned in the latter part of the hon. Member's Question. The only information available is that contained in the daily record of punishments for each ship in the Navy.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Cannot we have a summary of the daily records?

MR. PRETYMAN: It would be a tedious and expensive task to get one out, and I do not think it worth while.

Chatham Military Railway.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether he is aware that a military railway to connect Fort Durland, near Chatham, with Chatham Barracks, planned to run through War Department land for the greater part of its length, had been constructed till it reached, in the immediate vicinity of Fort Durland, a strip of land belonging to the Naval authorities, who had not been consulted in the construction of the railway, and that the refusal of the consent of these authorities to the building of the line on their land has led to the suspension of the work; that near the Chatham end of the railway portions of a bridge were erected at a great cost, with massive piers, to take the line over the main road, when it was discovered that a company had rights to run an electric tramway on the overhead system along this road, so that it was impossible to raise the bridge sufficiently high to clear the wires without altering the level of the railway for hundreds of yards, the result being that the portions of the bridge already erected have been destroyed, and the work on that side brought to a standstill; and will he state what is the sum which it is calculated has been lost by these mistakes, and under what Vote in the Estimates will it come; and whether the War Office has any, and, if so, what explanation of this waste of public money.

*THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. BROMLEY DAVENPORT, Cheshire, Macclesfield): I am informed that the work in question was not suspended on account of any non-agreement with the Naval authorities, but for reasons which were stated in reply to a Question on the 11th June, 1903.† The construction of the line, which was partly undertaken for the purpose of the instruction of the Railway Companies and other Royal Engineer units, was suspended on the introduction of an improved scheme of decentralised training, which rendered the line unnecessary. There was no difficulty connected with an electric tramway running under the line. The whole cost of the work done was comparatively small, as military labour of men under instruction was utilised, and the materials will to a very great extent be made use of elsewhere. The sum may be stated approximately at £2,000, and was included in the amount voted under Vote X. on page 70 of the Estimates for the years 1901–2, 1902–3, 1903–4, under the item "Chatham. Acquisition of land and erection of torpedo factory, etc."

Bitterne Remount Depot.

MR. LAMBERT (Devonshire, South Molton): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether any land has been bought by the Government at Bitterne, near Southampton, for the purpose of a remount depôt; if so, what was the area bought and the price paid.

MR. BROMLEY DAVENPORT: No land has yet been bought at Bitterne, but negotiations for purchase are in progress.

Transvaal Explosives Tax.

MR. WHITLEY (Halifax): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies if the saving on explosives in the Transvaal in 1903, as compared with 1899, was 1s. 3½d. per ton milled; and if the saving on the total tons milled was £408,533 during the year in which the receipts from the gold mine profit tax were £162,573.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. LYTTELTON, Warwick and Leamington): I am aware that the saving has been estimated at 1s. 3½d. as stated by competent mining authorities. For the explanation of the amount received under the 10 per cent. profit tax, which represents something over 1s. per ton, I must refer the hon. Member to Lord Milner's despatch of 18th June last in the Parliamentary Paper Cd. 2102 just published.

MR. WHITLEY: Are the figures in my Question correct?

MR. LYTTELTON: Yes, as far as I can gather from the authorities I have been able to consult.

MR. MARKHAM (Nottinghamshire, Mansfield): Can the right hon. Gentleman say what the saving would have been, both to the mining industry and the Transvaal, if a new dynamite monopoly had not been granted to the De Beers Company of South Africa?

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! That does not arise out of the Answer.

Transvaal Legislative Council.

Mr. BUCHANAN (Perthshire, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies what alterations in the constitution of the Legislative Council of the Transvaal the Government propose to make when the term of office of the present council expires; and whether a representative system will be introduced.

Mr. LYTTELTON: As I stated yesterday, in answer to a Question by the hon. Member for South Molton†, I am not prepared to make any statement on the subject at present.

Mr. BUCHANAN: Have any communications passed with the Transvaal Government.

Mr. LYTTELTON: I cannot go beyond the Answers I have already given.

Mr. LAMBERT: Will the right hon. Gentleman be in a position to make any statement before the session is over?

Mr. LYTTELTON: I cannot say.

Transvaal Finance.

Mr. BUCHANAN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, before the debate on Transvaal finance is taken, he will lay before the House a Report of the proceedings of the Inter-Colonial Council in June; and whether he will also obtain from Lord Milner the final figures of actual revenue and expenditure for the year ending 30th June.

Mr. LYTTELTON: There has not yet been time to receive from Lord Milner a full Report of the proceedings, but I am including in the Papers which will be published this week the text of his opening address as President. I will ask Lord Milner to supply me with the final figures as soon as he is in a position to do so.

Mr. BUCHANAN: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered the second part of my Question: may I further ask if he will be able to tell us before the Vote comes on what modifications have been accepted by the Home Government in regard to the constitution, etc.

Mr. LYTTELTON: I must ask for notice of that.

British Consular Representation in Turkey.

Mr. STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether His Majesty's Government will enter into friendly conference with the Governments of France and Italy with a view to the early augmentation of the Consular staff in the European and Asiatic provinces of Turkey, by the appointment of travelling Consular Attachés and assistants to the existing Consulates in those vilayets.

The UNDER-SECRETARY of STATE for FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Earl Percy, Kensington, S.): The Consular staff which His Majesty's Government maintain in the European and Asiatic provinces of Turkey is, in their opinion, sufficient for the protection of British interests, and as at present advised they see no reason for increasing it.

Administration of the East Africa Protectorate—Dismissal of Mr. Hopton.

Mr. CATHCART WASON (Orkney and Shetland): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he can state on what grounds Mr. Hopton was dismissed by telegraph from the service of the East Africa Protectorate, and why his repeated demands for reasons for his dismissal have not been acceded to; who the gentleman is who has been appointed to his place; and whether he has any practical knowledge of agriculture and knowledge of native language and customs that qualify him for the post.

Earl PERCY: Mr. Hopton was relieved of his duties in the East Africa Protectorate at the request of Sir C. Eliot on the grounds of his unsuitability for the appointment. He was informed of the reasons on three occasions by His Majesty's Commisioner. Mr. J. K. Hill has been appointed to succeed Mr. Hopton. He has practical knowledge of farming and agriculture in Great Britain and South Africa, and was recommended for the post by Sir C. Eliot.

East Africa and Uganda Finances.

MR. CATHCART WASON: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if copies of the Estimates for the service of the East Africa and Uganda Protectorate are to be obtained by Members of Parliament.

EARL PERCY: The Estimates for the Protectorates are given under Class V., Vote II.

Spirit Distillation in England.

MR. WILLIAM McKILLOP (Sligo, N.): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will state the total quantity of spirit distilled in England during the year 1903, and how much was used for methylation, rectifying, and compounding purposes; whether any English spirit is used as whisky in Customs warehouses in Leith; and, if so, what is the total quantity despatched thereto from distilleries in England; whether he has any official information showing the materials from which English spirit is usually distilled; and if any beet molasses from abroad is used in its manufacture.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN, Worcestershire, E.): The total quantity of spirits distilled in England during the year ended 31st March, 1904, was 11,694,851 proof gallons. The quantity of home-made spirits used for methylation during the same period was 4,398,002 proof gallons. I have no means of knowing the quantities used for rectifying and compounding. 33,300 proof gallons of British spirits were despatched to Customs warehouses at Leith from English distilleries during the twelve months ended the 30th of June, 1904. The materials commonly used in the distillation of English spirits are malt, unmalted grain, molasses, sugar, glucose and rice. No doubt beet molasses is used to some extent, but I have no means of knowing the quantities.

Tobacco and the Budget.

MR. LAMBERT: I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer if, having regard to the inconvenience to the commercial interests of the country, he can state whether he intends to continue or modify his Budget proposals for the taxation of tobacco.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: I propose to proceed with the Finance Bill as early as possible. I must defer any further statement as to the tobacco duties until the discussion is resumed.

MR. LAMBERT: Cannot the right hon. Gentleman give a more precise indication of the date than is conveyed in the expression "as early as possible." Does he mean next week?

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: I must refer the hon. Member to the Answer given by the Prime Minister.

MR. LAMBERT: What was it?

MR. McCRAE (Edinburgh, E.): Will the right hon. Gentleman follow the example of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Bristol when dealing with the cheque tax, and make a statement before the discussion is resumed?

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: I have just answered that Question.

Telephonic Communication between Country Villages and Market Towns.

CAPTAIN BAGOT (Westmoreland, Kendal): I beg to ask the Postmaster-General whether, in view of the fact that if post office telephone call offices were established in country village post offices, callers would not be able to communicate with subscribers to the National Telephone Company in the nearest or any adjacent town, in which the exchange was under the National Telephone Company, he will state if this hindrance to an extension of the telephone system between rural districts and country towns is owing to statute law or some agreement between the Postmaster-General and the Telephone Company; and, if so, will he take steps to remedy this state of affairs with a view to placing country villages in telephonic communication with their market and other towns.

THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL (Lord STANLEY, Lancashire, Westhoughton): The absence of the right of intercommunication between call offices and exchanges of the the post office in any provincial exchange area and the system of the National Telephone Company in the same area, is not due to any statutory provision or to any agreement between the Postmaster-General and the Company. It arises from the fact that the Postmaster-General has no power to require the Company to give such intercommunication, glad as I should be if such an arrangement could be brought about.

Ankylostomiasis.

MR. JOHNSON (Gateshead): On behalf of the hon. Member for Mid-Durham, I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has taken or will take steps to ensure that in the event of miner's disease (known as ankylostomiasis) arising in any coal or metalliferous mine, a notification thereof should be forthwith sent to the medical officer of health and the mines' inspector of the district in which such mine is situate, and that the isolation of cases that may arise should be secured; and whether, if the administrative powers of the Home Office be not adequate for the purpose, he will introduce the necessary legislation.

THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. COCHRANE, Ayrshire, N.): I have not yet learnt the results of the conferences between owners and men which were to be arranged in each district to discuss this subject generally, and until I do so any statement as to the precise steps to be taken for the prevention of the disease would be premature, but I doubt whether, from the nature of the case, it is practicable to require notification and isolation of every case of the disease. I am glad to say that no case has yet been found in a coal mine.

Prosecutions for Palmistry, etc., Frauds.

MR. JOHN CAMPBELL (Armagh, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the frauds perpetrated in connection with the practice of palmistry, crystal-gazing, clairvoyance, and other species of fortune telling in the West End; and, if so, whether he will instruct the police to institute prosecutions without further delay.

MR. COCHRANE: I have very little to add to the Answer given by my predecessor to a similar Question put by the hon. Member some three years ago.† It was stated then that the police had instructions to watch suspicious cases of the nature indicated by the hon. Member and to take proceedings when there was good ground for believing that fraud or imposition was being practised. Those instructions stand; and a prosecution has been instituted whenever satisfactory evidence of fraud or imposition was available.

MR. FLAVIN: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the residents of Park Lane take a very deep interest in this question?

Calf Lymph—Disposal of the Calves.

MR. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether the Government hire live calves for the purpose of vaccinating for lymph; whether he can state at what cost and how long those calves are kept; what becomes of them after being returned to the owner; whether this class of meat is sold as veal for public consumption; whether he has any reports on its fitness for human food by local medical officers of health; and whether it is identified when being sold as "lymph veal."

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. WALTER LONG, Bristol, S.): Calves are hired at a cost of from 20s. to 25s. a week for the purpose mentioned. The number of calves used varies. At present the average number is approximately fifteen weekly. The calves are kept for about two weeks. After the lymph has been collected from them, they are slaughtered, and their carcases are thoroughly examined by a veterinary expert. Sound carcases are delivered to the contractor by whom the animals are supplied, to be disposed of as he thinks fit. The concern of the Department in the matter then ceases. I am not aware that any medical officer of health has made a report on the subject, but I am advised that, when the carcases are found to be sound, there is no reason why they should not be sold for food. I have no information as to the practice with regard to the sale of the carcases as meat. The number of the carcases delivered to the contractor in 1903–4 was about 1,000. This is above the average.

† See (4) Debates, lxxxix., 683.

MR. FIELD: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he can state how many calves are kept by the Local Government Board as reservoirs of lymph for vaccination purposes; how many animals so used are sold annually as food for the people; and where the sales usually take place.

MR. WALTER LONG: I may refer the hon. Member to my reply to his other Question in the Paper to-day on this subject.

Traffic Regulations in the Parks.

MR. SCOTT-MONTAGU (Hampshire, New Forest): I beg to ask the hon. Member for Chorley, as representing the First Commissioner of Works, whether, if steps are taken to enforce the ten-mile limit for motor-cars in the Mall and elsewhere in the Parks, the police will equally be instructed to prosecute all drivers of horse-drawn vehicles exceeding that speed.

LORD BALCARRES (Lancashire, Chorley): The reply is in the negative, as the First Commissioner has already the power, under the Parks Regulation Act of 1872, to limit the speed of carriages to ten miles an hour or to any such speed as may be considered necessary to protect the public from annoyance. The First Commissioner has always taken steps to secure that traffic shall be regulated so as to preserve the enjoyment of the Parks for all classes of the public.

MR. SCOTT-MONTAGU: Does the noble Lord not think it desirable to treat all classes of traffic on the same basis ?

LORD BALCARRES: That is precisely what we propose to do.

Board of Agriculture Leaflets.

MR. A. K. LOYD (Berkshire, Abingdon): I beg to ask the hon. Member for North Huntingdonshire, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, whether the demand for Nos. 7, 17, 37, 59, and 71 of the leaflets issued by the Board has caused these leaflets to be out of print; and whether the Board will consider the desirability of having them reprinted.

MR. AILWYN FELLOWES (Huntingdonshire, Ramsey): The leaflets to which my hon. friend refers are out of print and we do not propose, at any rate for the present, to re-issue them separately, the time when they were of general interest having passed. They will, however, be included in the volume of leaflets about to be published in book form. All leaflets of present or permanent interest are reprinted so soon as there is any sign of an edition being exhausted.

Strokestown Drainage District.

MR. JAMES O'KELLY (Roscommon, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Strokestown Rural District Council recently passed a resolution calling the attention of the Board of Works to the state of the rivers in the Strokestown Drainage District, and complaining that this neglect was the cause of floods and injury to the local farmers in recent years; and, if so, will he say whether it is the intention of the Board of Works to take the necessary steps in the matter.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. WYNDHAM, Dover): The resolution was received. The trustees of the drainage district are responsible for the maintenance of the drainage works in good order. The Board of Works informed the district council that complaints of neglect should be made in the first instance to the trustees through their secretary. If complaints so made are without effect a complaint would then properly lie to the Board of Works.

Irish School Teachers' Remuneration—Kilrusheighter Teacher's Claim.

MR. P. A. MCHUGH (Leitrim, N): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the principal teacher of Kilrusheighter (county Sligo) National School taught agriculture for the period commencing in October, 1899, and ending in July, 1900, and was paid £12 17s. 6d. in February, 1901, on account of such tuition in that period, and that the Commissioners of National Education in calculating the consolidated income of this teacher refused to take into account the portion of that sum (£7 14s. 6d.) which was earned by him for the period from 1st October, 1899, to 31st March, 1900, and assigned as the ground of their refusal the fact that the payment for his tuition in agriculture for the period from October, 1899, to July, 1900, was not made until February, 1901; and, if so, whether, seeing that under Rule 200 the Commissioners were bound to include all emoluments actually earned from State sources within the three years ended 31st March, 1900, the application of the manager, Very Rev. John Melvin, P.P., for a revision of this teacher's salary will be granted.

Mr. WYNDHAM: The claims of this teacher have formed the subject of a correspondence between myself and the Rev. Mr. Melvin, a copy of which I recently communicated to the hon. Member. As already pointed out, the Commissioners had no power to take into account, when fixing the consolidated income of the teacher, a payment made subsequently to the 31st March, 1900. But even if payment had been made before that date, it was never contemplated by the rules that grants covering, as in this case, services rendered for a period of only six months should be continued in perpetuity under the form of consolidated income.

Mr. THOMAS O'DONNELL (Kerry, W.): Does not the Rule specifically state that all moneys actually earned by the teacher for the three years should be brought into the calculation?

Mr. P. A. McHUGH: And is it not the fact that this £7 14s. 6d. was earned in the period ending the 31st March, 1900?

Mr. WYNDHAM was understood to reply that it was never contemplated to include money earned for a purely temporary duty.

Technical Instruction Act—Return of Officials.

Mr. JOYCE (Limerick): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will grant a Return dealing with officials employed by the various county boroughs in Ireland in carrying out the provisions of the Technical Instruction Act.

Mr. WYNDHAM: I am prepared to give a Return in the form proposed, with the exception of the information indicated in Columns 3 and 8. For the reasons already explained, I cannot consent to this information.

Appended is the Return asked for.

Technical Instruction (Ireland) (Officials). Return of Officials employed upon the 1st day of June, 1904, by the various County Boroughs and Urban Councils in Ireland in carrying out the provisions of the Technical Instruction (Ireland) Act, in the following form:—

1.	2.	3.	4.	5.	6.	7.	8.
Name.	Description of office.	Qualification, giving University degrees, the College attended, and time spent.	Salary.	Date of appointment.	Previous employment.	Tenure of office.	Nationality.

Munster Dairy School.

Mr. MURPHY (Kerry, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Department of Agriculture now propose to utilise the £10,000 set aside for the enlargement and improvement of the Munster Dairy School; and what is the reason for the delay in carrying out these improvements for which money was granted under the Act of 1889.

MR. WYNDHAM: The hon. Member does not appear to have seen my reply to the similar Question of 4th May by the hon. Member for North Cork.† I have no further statement to make at present.

Irish Intermediate Education—System of Inspection.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the Report of the Intermediate Education Board for Ireland for 1903, dealing with the subject of the establishment of a system of permanent inspection of the working of intermediate education; whether he is aware that the Board, in June, 1903, forwarded a resolution to the Under-Secretary to the effect that they desired to impress on the Lord-Lieutenant the great urgency of appointing permanent inspectors as a necessary part of the reforms aimed at by the Act of 1900; and, if so, what is the cause of delay in the adoption of a system of inspection declared to be urgent by the Board responsible for the working of secondary education in Ireland.

MR. WYNDHAM: Yes, Sir. The Government has not refused to provide for a system of inspection. It has only refused to establish, at the present moment, a system of inspection conducted by a staff of permanent Civil servants; and both on financial and educational grounds it adheres to that position until the question of the parts which examination and inspection are respectively to play in the distribution of State aid to the schools has been settled. This is one of the matters now under investigation by the Committee of Inquiry into Intermediate Education in Ireland.

MR. FLYNN: Is the right hon. Gentleman not aware that the Commissioners of Intermediate Education fifteen years ago reported against the present system and a supplementary system was set up.

MR. WYNDHAM: Yes; but I have said the whole matter is now under investigation.

Blakeney Estate, County Galway.

MR. ROCHE (Galway, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state if the Blakeney Estate, Abbert, county Galway, is in the Land Judge's Court; if so, for how long; whether he can state the name of the agent or receiver; whether he has been instructed to take advantage of the Land Purchase Act; and whether he will be directed to supply to the tenants any necessary information to enable them to make an offer for the property.

MR. WYNDHAM: The estate is in the Land Judge's Court. A petition for sale was filed by the late owner in 1883, but little has been done to effect a sale. There is no receiver over the lands, and the estate is solvent. The provisions of Section 40 of the Act of 1896 are not, therefore, applicable in the case. The Land Judge cannot compel a sale, but it is understood that when the matter comes again before him in November, the parties having carriage of the estate must either elect to sell or have the proceedings dismissed from the Court.

Irish Development Grant Bill — Petty Sessions Clerks Fund.

MR. O'SHEE (Waterford, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the County Waterford County Council has passed a resolution urging that he should withdraw the clause in the Irish Development Grant Bill, which proposes to transfer to the Treasury the sum of £150,000 standing to the credit of the Petty Sessions Clerks Fund; and whether he will re-consider the matter, and adopt the course suggested.

MR. WYNDHAM: No, Sir; the resolution does not appear to have been brought under my notice. In reply to the second part of the Question I would refer to my reply to the similar Question of 20th June by the hon. Member for South Tyrone.‡

Kerry Rent Appeals.

MR. THOMAS O'DONNELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that tenants in county Kerry who served their landlords with rent-fixing notices six years ago are still waiting to have their appeals heard; whether, under these circumstances, steps will be taken to have those appeals heard during the coming autumn.

MR. WYNDHAM: The Land Commissioners sat in Killarney for the hearing of appeals in July, 1903. The list then for hearing contained all appeals lodged prior to May, 1901. It is however, a fact that in some cases in which appeals were lodged since that date and which are still pending, the originating notices were originally lodged as far back as the period mentioned in the Question. It is not at present possible to say when the Commissioners will hold their next sitting for the disposal of appeals from Kerry.

MR. THOMAS O'DONNELL: Seeing that six years have elapsed since the notices were served can the right hon. Gentleman hold out any hope that a decision will be arrived at in the next ten years?

MR. WYNDHAM: Yes, I think I can promise that.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): May I say that I propose on Thursday next to raise the whole question of the collapse of the Appeal Court.

MR. FLAVIN: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the tenants pending the decision of the Court are compelled to pay the whole rent, and is not that a great burden on them?

Amalgamation of Offices of Antrim and Belfast Clerks of the Peace.

MR. JOSEPH DEVLIN (Kilkenny, N): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state the nature of the arrangements made by the Lord-Lieutenant with reference to the amalgamation of the offices of the Clerk of the Peace for Belfast, Clerk of the Peace for county Antrim, and Clerk of the Crown for county Antrim; what saving will be effected to the Treasury by the new arrangements; and whether the saving thus effected will be devoted to Irish purposes.

MR. WYNDHAM: These offices are united in the same person under the provisions of Section 8 of the County Court and Officers Act, 1877, and Section 69 of the Local Government Act, 1898. The amount of the salary, and of the allowance for clerical assistance, has not yet been fixed. When fixed it will be paid out of moneys voted by Parliament. As a set-off, to some small extent, to this charge the fees hitherto received by the Clerk of the Peace and Clerk of the Crown will be paid into the Exchequer. In the result a burden not hitherto borne by the Treasury will be transferred to Imperial Funds to the relief of local rates.

MR. MACVEAGH (Down, S.): Is it not calculated that a very large saving will be effected by the amalgamation.

MR. WYNDHAM: At any rate it is a bargain resting upon a statutory provision.

Westropp Estate, County Clare.

MR. SHEEHY (Meath, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to a request lodged with the Land Commissioners by the tenants on the Westropp Estate, county Clare, under the seventh Section of the Land Act of 1903; and, if so, whether he will take steps to expedite the sale of this property.

MR. WYNDHAM: The Estates Commissioners have issued a request to the Land Judge for particulars of this estate under Section 7 of the Act of 1903.

Police Constable Molloy, Royal Irish Constabulary.

MR. MACVEAGH: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state on what date the conduct of Police Constable Molloy, in connection with the Coleraine Petty Sessions, was reported to the Inspector-General; and on what date the censure was conveyed to him.

MR. WYNDHAM: On the 29th June in each case.

Greencastle Police Force.

Mr. JOSEPH DEVLIN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in view of the pledges given last year that the removal of Sergeant Gallagher from the charge of Greencastle, county Antrim, police district, and the substitution for him of Head Constable Moore was only a temporary arrangement, he will say whether any circumstance has arisen in the meantime to cause a reconsideration of that promise; and, if so, what is its nature; and, if nothing detrimental to the character of Sergeant Gallagher has taken place since then, he will be reinstated in his old position.

Mr. WYNDHAM: The question of the retention of the head constable at Greencastle is entirely a matter for the consideration of the Constabulary authorities. He was transferred to that station in August last in the interests of the public. The Commissioner of Police at Belfast reports that he has the confidence of all classes and that he is aware of no reasons for transferring him from Greencastle. The Inspector-General concurs in the views of the Commissioner, and I do not propose to intervene in the matter.

Mr. JOSEPH DEVLIN: Is not the retention of Head Constable Moore looked upon as an insult to Sergeant Gallagher?

Mr. WYNDHAM: The hon. Member will see that the employment of an officer at a particular place cannot and does not reflect on any other officer's character. It is a matter of discipline and administrative convenience with which the Inspector-General is competent to deal.

Mr. SLOAN (Belfast, S.): Have the inhabitants of Greencastle made any complaint as to this head constable being there.

Mr. WYNDHAM: I do not think so.

Mr. MACVEAGH: Did not the right hon. Gentleman last session say that the head constable was only stationed there temporarily, and did not the Police Commissioner for the city of Belfast promise a deputation subsequently that the appointment should be permanent?

Mr. WYNDHAM: I cannot say, but at any rate it does not alter my view that this is a matter for the Inspector-General.

Mr. MACVEAGH: Has the Belfast Commissioner superior jurisdiction to the right hon. Gentleman.

Administration of the Arms Act at Maryborough.

*Mr. DELANY (Queen's County, Ossory): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state by whom a gun, the property of Mr. Peter Dowling, Straboe, was given into the possession of the police at Maryborough; and whether the gun has been returned to the owner.

Mr. WYNDHAM: The gun was handed to the police by the owner of the property on which it was found. On the 16th June† I stated I had been informed that the gun had been identified by Mr. Dowling as belonging to him; that he had undertaken to make a declaration to this effect, and that the weapon was taken out of his possession without his knowledge or approval; and that when this declaration had been made it would be restored to him. He has not yet made the declaration, however, and has informed the police he is not now sure that the gun is his.

*Mr. DELANY: Who was the owner of the property.

Mr. WYNDHAM: I confess I cannot fathom the mystery of the gun. I hope it will get back to the right man.

Comyn Kenny Estate, County Galway.

Mr. ROCHE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can now state if the tenant purchasers under Acts previous to 1903, in the neighbourhood of the Comyn Kenny Estate, county Galway, which has been purchased recently by the Congested Districts Board, may have their uneconomic holdings increased without requiring them to resell their purchased holdings to the Congested Districts Board.

† See (4) Debates, cxxxvi., 288.

MR. WYNDHAM: The tenant purchaser is not bound to resell his holding. The outstanding balance of the loan already made must be consolidated with the new advance and a new annuity becomes payable in respect of the enlarged holding, which is thenceforth treated as one holding. Some administrative difficulties exist when the advances are made under different statutes. These are under consideration.

In reply to a further Question by MR. KILBRIDE,

MR. WYNDHAM said that when an addition was made to a holding which had been purchased the two were merged into one holding and the instalments were consolidated; but, where the first holding was purchased under a former Act and the addition under the present Act, there were technical difficulties for which he hoped a solution would be found.

Miltown-Malbay Petty Sessions Clerk.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Kilkenny): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in view of the fact that Head Constable Allingham was recently elected petty sessions clerk at Miltown-Malbay, he can say what special qualifications beyond being a police officer he had over local civilian candidates which induced the local magistrates to appoint him; was Head Constable Allingham in the police service when elected; and, if not, when did he leave the force for the purposes of his candidature, and was it by leave; whether he is still in the police force; and can he give the date when he is to take up the duties of petty sessions clerk.

MR. WYNDHAM: The head constable was stationed at Miltown-Malbay for twenty years prior to his transfer on promotion to another district in November last. He was consequently well known to the magistrates who elected him to the position of petty sessions clerk, for which he was considered the best qualified. The Inspector-General granted him permission to become a candidate. He will qualify for a pension from the police force on the 14th inst., and he cannot enter on his new duties until after that date. Before his appointment is confirmed he will undergo an examination to test his fitness for the office.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that there is great dissatisfaction in the district as to the way in which this appointment was made, seeing that some of the magistrates were not summoned to the meeting. Has the right hon. Gentleman any power to insist on a new election?

MR. WYNDHAM. I am not aware of the matters referred to, and I doubt if I have any power, but I will inquire.

Land Purchase by Congested Districts Board in County Sligo.

MR. O'DOWD (Sligo, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will give the names of the two estates recently purchased by the Congested Districts Board in Sligo for resale to tenants; also the acreage of tenanted and untenanted land; the amount of purchase money; gross rental; and number of years purchase paid the landlord in each case.

MR. WYNDHAM: It will be more convenient to give a written reply to this Question, and with the hon. Member's permission the desired information will be printed with to-day's Votes.

Harlech Estate, County Sligo.

MR. O'DOWD: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the fee simple of the Leitrim Hill grazing farm, situate on the Harlech Estate, in Tobercurry Union, county Sligo, has recently been purchased by a landlord named Phibbs, without the knowledge of the small tenants of the district, who have been using it as an accommodation farm for a number of years; if so, will he say if such sale was sanctioned by the Land Commission; and, if not, will this matter be inquired into with the view of having the farm utilised for the enlargement of small holdings, should the estate be sold to the tenants at any future time.

MR. WYNDHAM: The estate comprising the farm referred to has not been offered to the Estates Commissioners. I am also informed that it has not been offered to the Congested Districts Board.

MR. O'DOWD: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that negotiations are pending between the landlord and tenants on the Harlech Estate?

MR. WYNDHAM: I am not.

River Owenmore Drainage.

MR. O'DOWD: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in view of the fact that the River Owenmore in the county Sligo takes its rise in, and flows through, a scheduled congested district; and that a scheme for the drainage of this river under the Arterial Drainage Acts is, under existing circumstances, impracticable, he will advise the Congested Districts Board or the Board of Agriculture to allocate a certain sum by way of grant in aid to local effort for the carrying out of the work of draining this river.

MR. WYNDHAM: There are no funds at the disposal of the Congested Districts Board or Department of Agriculture out of which to contribute towards the cost of drainage works.

MR. O'DOWD: If the people in the locality take the initiative in the work will they be encouraged with a grant from public funds?

MR. WYNDHAM: I do not think there is any fund available for the purpose.

Congested Districts Board—Examinations for Temporary Clerkships.

MR. FIELD: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will explain why the system of examinations for temporary clerkships in the Congested Districts Board, Ireland, has been abolished; whether, in making future appointments, the Board will have preference for those men whose names were registered on their books to compete at the examinations; whether in the meantime the Board are filling vacancies by selecting men of good character and education, or who have had experience in public or commercial offices; whether a sub-committee has been selected to make these appointments; and, if so, will he state how long it is intended to continue this system.

MR. WYNDHAM: The Board is in correspondence with the Treasury on the subject of the mode of making appointments to its staff. Should it be found necessary to hold examinations for appointment of temporary clerks, pending a settlement of the question, the Board will endeavour to procure the services of the best men available.

Irish National School Teachers' Pay.

MR. FIELD: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Government intend to take measures so that the payment of Irish national teachers shall be increased so as to place them upon an equality with English teachers.

MR. WYNDHAM: In any comparison between the incomes of Irish national school teachers and teachers in England, regard must be had to the burden on the State and on local sources. The incomes paid to teachers in Ireland represent a payment from the State of £2 8s. 11d. for each child in average daily attendance. In England and Wales, the cost of maintenance of the schools is £2 13s. 2d. per pupil, of which only £1 10s. 8d. was derived from the State in the case of Board schools.

Irish Congested Districts Board Staff.

MR. FIELD: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he will explain why the Congested Districts Board (Ireland) have asked the Treasury to allow their staff to be recruited from the regular permanent Civil Service men who have entered through the Civil Service Commissioners' Examination; and whether this suggestion will be adopted by the Treasury.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY (Mr. VICTOR CAVENDISH, Derbyshire, W.): The Congested Districts Board, through the Irish Government, have asked whether the Treasury would be disposed to consider favourably a proposal to appoint a certain number of permanent clerks to their staff. Correspondence on the subject is still proceeding, but no decision has yet been arrived at.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Can the right hon. Gentleman say what is the Irish Government? We do not know.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE ACT (1882) AMENDMENT BILL [LORDS].

Read the first time; to be read a second time upon Monday next and to be printed. [Bill 257.]

NEW MEMBER SWORN.

LICENSING BILL (PROCEDURE).

Order read, for resuming adjourned debate on Question [1st July], "That the proceedings in Committee and on Report of the Licensing Bill shall be brought to a conclusion in the manner hereinafter mentioned on six allotted days:

(a) The proceedings in Committee on Clause 1 on the first allotted day;

(b) The proceedings in Committee in Clauses 2 and 3 on the second allotted day;

(c) The proceedings in Committee on Clause 4 on the third allotted day;

(d) The proceedings in Committee on the remaining clauses of the Bill, and on any new Government clauses, and on schedules and any new Government schedules, and any other proceedings necessary to bring the Committee stage to a conclusion on the fourth allotted day;

(e) The proceedings on Report on any new clauses and on Amendments to Clauses 1, 2, and 3 of that Bill, be brought to a conclusion on the fifth allotted day; and

(f) The proceedings on Report be concluded on the sixth allotted day.

After this Order comes into operation, any day shall be considered an allotted day for the purposes of this Order on which the Licensing Bill is put down as the first Order of the Day.

At 11 p.m. on the said allotted days, or if the day is a Friday at 4.30 p.m., the Chairman or Speaker shall put forthwith the Question or Questions on any Amendment or Motion already proposed from the Chair, and shall next proceed successively to put forthwith the Question on any Amendments moved by the Government of which notice has been given (but no other Amendments) and on every Question necessary to dispose of the allotted business to be concluded on the allotted day.

In the case of Government Amendments, or of Government new clauses or schedules, he shall put only the Question that the Amendment be made, or that the clause or schedule be added to the Bill, as the case may be.

At 12 midnight on the day on which the Third Reading of the Bill is put down as first Order, or, if that day is a Friday, at 5.30 p.m., the Speaker shall put forthwith any Question necessary to conclude the proceedings on that stage of the Bill.

Proceedings to which this Order relates shall not be interrupted (except at an Afternoon Sitting at 7.30 p.m.), under the provisions of any Standing Order relating to Sittings of the House.

After the passing of this Order, on any day on which any proceedings on the Licensing Bill stand as the first Order of the Day, no dilatory Motion on the Bill, nor under Standing Order No. 10, nor Motion to postpone a clause, shall be received unless moved by the Minister in charge of the Bill, and the Question on any such Motion shall be put forthwith. Nor shall any opposed Private Business be set down at the Evening Sitting for consideration on any of the allotted days or on the day on which the Third Reading of the Bill is put down as first Order.

If Progress be reported the Chairman shall put this Order in force in any subsequent sitting of the Committee."—(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

Question again proposed.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon Boroughs) moved as an Amendment the omission from line two of the words "in Committee and." This was, he said, really in the nature of a protest against the destruction of the Committee stage of the Bill. He could have quite understood a proposal from the Government to limit the discussion on the Report stage, for they might have pointed out that questions having been fully threshed out in Committee it was rather unfair to go over them again on the Report stage. It would have been much more reasonable to give six days to the Report stage than to confine the Committee stage to that period. The Committee stage was the most important stage, and he did appeal to the Government to confine their guillotine Motion to the Report stage. He supposed it was quite futile for him to make the appeal, but he did not think the Opposition would be doing its duty if it did not protest on every possible opportunity against the virtual destruction of the Committee stage. He had gone through the Amendments thoroughly, and his Parliamentary experience enabled him to gather that the number of substantial ones on the Paper was so large that if they merely divided on each and did not attempt to discuss them, the Resolution did not allow sufficient time to deal with all of them. It was therefore perfectly preposterous to attempt to confine the discussion to six days; it was reducing their work to an absolutely absurd farce.

Amendment proposed—

"In line 2, to leave out the words 'in Committee and.' "—(Mr. Lloyd-George.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'in Committee and' stand part of the Question."

*MR. DAVID MACIVER (Liverpool, Kirkdale) said that as one of the supporters of the Licensing Bill, which he believed to be a thoroughly good one, he objected to seeing it wrecked by a side wind. In his opinion the proposal of the Prime Minister would afford amply sufficient time for the honest consideration of the measure. He had no wish to say anything about obstruction, but hon. Members knew very well that in the Committee stage, as one Amendment was disposed of, another technically in order, and raising exactly the same point, was put on the Paper. Therefore he felt that unless the Government Resolution was agreed to in its entirety, there was considerable probability of the Bill being smothered in talk. He could not help feeling that in the interest of fair debate it was better the closure Resolution should be agreed to as it stood.

MR. SPEAKER: Order! order, the hon. Member is now dealing with the whole Question. The Amendment only raises a very small point.

*MR. DAVID MACIVER said, as he understood it, the point was whether or not the Government Resolution should apply to the Committee stage. That was the point he was endeavouring to argue.

MR. SPEAKER: But the hon. Member was expressing his opinion that the whole Motion should be passed.

* MR. DAVID MACIVER said he did think so. Continuing, the hon. Member said the question was whether the Committee stage should be prolonged indefinitely. Now his view was that it would be a great advantage if the speeches were terse and to the point, without being unreasonably prolonged. If that were secured there was a probability that reasonable Amendments would be carefully argued, and that the speeches would be listened to. The tendency was to reiteration, and the Government Resolution would prevent that. There was another point to be considered. Some hon. Members of that House had occupations outside, and it ought not to be made impossible for those who were not merely professional politicians to attend to those occupations. He for one looked on the House of Commons as the great Council of the Nation, and they ought to be able to listen to real debates, to argue real Amendments, and to have them discussed impartially. Too many of the Amendments now brought forward were mere repetition, and that afforded ample justification for closuring the debate on the Committee Stage.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) said he viewed with considerable apprehension the application of this Resolution, which practically superseded the Rules recently adopted for the conduct of the business of the House. In his opinion the most useful stage in the progress of a Bill was the Committee stage; it was at that stage that the suggestions were made the adoption of which made a measure practicable and workable. Useful and fruitful work was done in Committee. But he desired to point out what would be one effect of the adoption of the Resolution as it now stood. It provided that the Committee stage on the Licensing Bill should be brought to a conclusion after so many days. Did hon. Members quite apprehend what that meant? What not unfrequently happened in the case of other Bills was not unlikely to happen on this measure. It might become necessary to recommit the Bill, and he doubted whether, supposing the Resolution were carried, Mr. Speaker would put a Motion for recommittal, inasmuch as there would be no Committee to which the Bill could be recommitted, because by the Resolution the Committee stage would have been concluded. His view was that in voting for this Amendment the House would be voting for the curtailment of its powers on the Report stage, and would deprive itself of the useful power of recommittal. In view of the fact that no plea either of urgency or of obstruction had been advanced in support of the Resolution, he deplored that the Government should, so soon after the new Rules had been passed, come before the House with a proposal of this nature.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.) said he would venture to point out that this Amendment really contradicted in substance the conclusion at which the House arrived at midnight last night. There was no speech which was made in favour of the Resolution which could not, with equal propriety of course, be made against this modification. The hon. Gentleman who moved must be perfectly aware, indeed he rather judged from his speech that he was aware, that to carry his Amendment would nullify the whole effect they might anticipate from the passage of the Resolution. It was on the Committee stage that they had the sixty-five pages of Amendments, it was on the Committee stage that they saw before them the actual means by which the proceedings on this Bill might be indefinitely postponed. And he had not the smallest doubt, when they had waded through the sixty-five pages of Amendments, and the additions which the ingenuity of hon. Gentlemen would doubtless prompt before the end of the Committee stage, that all this would have to be gone through again on the Report stage. This Amendment, in truth, was not an Amendment, but the destruction of the Resolution; and he thought everybody who supported the Resolution last night was bound in common consistency to support the Government now in resisting it. This was substantially the question which was discussed yesterday, and under the circumstances he did not doubt that the House could without very prolonged debate come to the same conclusion as that at which it arrived a few hours previously on the main question.

MR. MIDDLEMORE (Birmingham, N.) said the Prime Minister had parenthetically dealt with the question of the extension of the time for the Committee stage.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! That point will arise on a future Amendment.

MAJOR JAMESON (Clare, W.) declared that the House if it accepted this Amendment would nullify all the decisions at which it had arrived by huge majorities on the various stages of the Licensing Bill. The Amendment asked for more time for the consideration of the Bill. But he would like to draw the attention of the House to the time that had been already expended. More time was asked for the discussion of Clause 1, that clause dealt with the question of quarter sessions, and he would like to point out that the First and Second Reading debates were concentrated on the subject of the powers of quarter sessions.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! That question does not now arise. The point now is whether the Committee stage shall be expunged from the Resolution.

MAJOR JAMESON said he of course bowed to the ruling of the Chairman. What he was particularly anxious about was that the decisions arrived at by huge majorities should not now be nullified. The House must not stultify itself, and he hoped that the Government would rigidly adhere to their Resolution.

Question put.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Mr. Lloyd - George and Mr. M'Kenna.

MR. YOXALL (Nottingham, W.) moved to omit from the Resolution the words "and on Report." He submitted that in view of the number of Amendments to be moved in Committee by the Home Secretary, and of the suggestions which had already been partially accepted by the Government, more than two days would be necessary for the revision of the Bill on the Report stage. Anybody who had been a Member of the House for any length of time would know that the Report stage was very essential in order to revise the patchwork legislation done in Committee. The Committee stage he looked upon as a work in mosaic, Amendments were suggested and forms of words brought forward and accepted hurriedly, and they certainly required prolonged examination on Report, so as to make the Bill a workmanlike piece of legislation.

"In line 2, to leave out the words 'and on Report.'"—(Mr. Yoxall.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'and on Report' stand part of the Question."

MR. A. J. BALFOUR expressed surprise that it should have been thought necessary to move the Amendment. The main object of the Resolution was to deal with the Committee and Report stages.

DR. MACNAMARA (Camberwell, N.): And the Third Reading.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said that to accept the Amendment would be to stultify the decision at which the House had already arrived. In support of the contention of the Opposition that there had been no obstruction, it was urged that the debates in Committee had been carried on practically under Report rules; that the same Member had not thought it necessary to exercise his right to speak more than once on the same Amendment. That only showed that the same time might be expended on the Report stage as on the Committee stage, and that the sixty-six pages of Amendments now down for the Committee stage might be transferred bodily and without modification to the Report stage without any Member suffering the least inconvenience from the fact that he could only speak once on each Amendment. In these circumstances he hoped the House would not accept the Amendment, which would not make a merely superficial change in the Government proposal but would absolutely destroy it.

MR. DALZIEL (Kirkcaldy Burghs) thought the House would note with surprise the attitude taken up by the right hon. Gentleman. It was not reasonable for him to say that there was no case to be made o t for eliminating the Report stage which might not equally well have been urged in favour of the cutting out of the Committee stage. There could be no doubt that the feeling of the House in regard to the Resolution was far from unanimous, and during the debate some of the most respected Members on the Government side of the House had expressed themselves in favour of some extension of the time to be devoted to the Bill. If they were to have more time, obviously it could best be given in connection with the Report stage, and therefore he should support the Amendment. If the Report stage was entirely eliminated the House would gain the opportunity of compromise. The Report stage was obviously the stage when a measure could be reconsidered and compromise arrived at. As the Resolution now stood there would not be any possibility of that because when it was reached the whole of that stage might be occupied in considering second-rate Amendments. This was one of those cases where it was of the utmost importance that the well-considered opinion of the House should be recorded. As the matter stood who would say that the Report stage would be anything but a farce. He therefore suggested that as some of the supporters of the Government desired more elasticity this was the time that they ought to bring pressure to bear on the Prime Minister. If this Amendment were carried it would leave the House a full opportunity to consider the Bill on Report, and if there were any conciliatory spirit shown on the Treasury Bench he ventured to say the Report stage would not occupy the time which the right hon. Gentleman anticipated; that only a few important Amendments would be taken. If there was to be no conciliation at any cost he could only say it would not redound to the credit of the Government or to the advantage of the Bill, and it was a ridiculous farce to occupy the time in discussing this Resolution if the right hon. Gentleman had made up his mind to shut his ears to every argument in favour of the Amendment. He, however, hoped that it was not yet too late to appeal to the right hon. Gentleman to pay some heed to the unanimity of opinion in favour of this extension of time, and that the right hon. Gentleman would view with some favour this Amendment.

Mr. McKENNA (Monmouthshire, N.) expressed the opinion that in curtailing the limits of debate in this House, the right hon. Gentleman was not entitled to go one step beyond what was necessary. One ground for the Resolution of the right hon. Gentleman was that there were sixty-six pages of Amendments on the Paper for the Committee stage, and it was because the right hon. Gentleman did not see the possibility of getting through those Amendments at an early date that he moved this Resolution. But the right hon. Gentleman could not possibly know what Amendments would come up on Report and he submitted that the right hon. Gentleman ought not to adopt this drastic procedure with regard to Report until he saw how he stood. He asserted that if the Report stage was not curtailed the right hon. Gentleman would find that the Amendments put down would be inconsiderable and only deal with important phases of the Bill, and he contended that the House ought not to consent to the proposal to confine the discussion on Report to two days until they had seen what would happen in Committee. They did not know what the Bill was that would be brought before the House on Report. And if the right hon. Gentleman found he was being badly treated in the matter of Amendments he had two courses open to him, both effective. He could either move a Motion of this kind or move that all words down to a certain point stand part. This was a defence of the rights of the House which all private Members were entitled to claim. They were asked to limit the time for discussion before they knew what the Bill was they were to be asked to discuss and, having regard to the fact that only three lines of the Bill had been dealt with in Committee, he submitted that the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman was entirely without precedent, and that the right hon. Gentleman was going further than he was entitled to go. By consenting to the Amendment the right hon. Gentleman would give the House that opportunity to consider the various clauses of the Bill which they would be denied in Committee, without which the public at large would not accept the Bill in its final form as the considered judgment of the House of Commons.

Mr. SAMUEL EVANS (Glamorganshire, Mid.) thought that both the Committee and the Report stage should have been dealt with in this matter, but as the proposal with regard to the Committee had been carried he now submitted that the Amendment put down to keep the Report stage in the hands of the House without limitation was a reasonable Amendment. Only two days were to be allowed on Report, on new clauses as well as on all clauses amended in Committee. A full Report stage ought to be allowed for the new clauses alone, and for that very reason the Report stage ought to be extended. One very remarkable thing was that more than half the new clauses had been put down by supporters of the Government. The hon. Member for Hackney had one; the hon. Member for Wakefield had one, and the hon. Member for Hammersmith, who was a thick-and-thin supporter of the Government, also had one. There was actually one in the name of the hon. Member for North Kensington. What would he say when it was said that the Report stage was to be limited. If the Committee stage was to be swept away it was obviously the more important that the Report stage of the Bill should be carried out in accordance with the ordinary forms and rules of the House. As his hon. friend had pointed out they did not yet know what Amendments would be put down for Report. His hon. friend also suggested two remedies to the right hon. Gentleman for dealing with them; he would suggest another easy remedy. If it was found that there would have to be much discussion the right hon. Gentleman might suspend the operation of the twelve o'clock rule. That was always done at the end of a session in order to expedite business, and if the plan were adopted on the Report stage of this Bill it would be passed in a short time because although men were willing to stay in the House until two or even three o'clock in order to conduct business they would not wait for the mere purpose of obstruction. Rather than the Report stage should be curtailed he would suggest that the Third Reading stage of a Bill, which had been contested as this had been, was, in his opinion, perfectly useless. They only had stale speeches which were of no value, and he thought an hour should be quite sufficient to dispose of the Third Reading. They would then have a brilliant oration from the Home Secretary replied to by an eloquent twenty-minutes speech from the other side and then the division might be taken. In his own interests the Prime Minister would do well to make some concession. Putting aside mere newspaper opinion, there was the opinion of the solid and respectable members of the community to the effect that the Prime Minister had been forced to bring forward this closure Resolution at the behest of the brewers.

Mr. SPEAKER intimated that that question could not be rediscussed upon every Amendment.

Mr. SAMUEL EVANS said he was merely trying to urge a reason why, having got the Committee stage, the Prime Minister should exempt some portion of the proceedings from the Resolution in order to indicate his contention that he was acting in the interests of eternal justice and not of the brewers.

Sir ROBERT REID (Dumfries Burghs), referring to the Prime Minister's complaint that first a Motion was made to exempt the Committee stage and then another to exempt the Report stage, said the reason was that six days were not too much for the Committee and might not be too much for Report, and that so long as the right hon. Gentleman remained inflexible, those who thoroughly disapproved of the proposed limitation would have to attempt to secure the exemption first of one stage and then of another. It would be much more pleasant to leave the Bill, and look forward to another Parliament to deal with the matter, but that was not really the duty of the Opposition. Their duty was to make the best of the existing circumstances, and so long as the right hon. Gentleman remained obdurate they were bound to try in turn to get every relaxation of the Resolution that was possible. If the Government intended to make any addition to the number of days allotted it would be advisable that they should say so at once.

Mr. WHITLEY (Halifax) thought the House had already been played with to a considerable extent. Even to-day the Prime Minister had put up one of his supporters to delay the division. ["No."] The noble Lord the Member for Chorley approached the hon. Member for the Kirkdale Division obviously to prevail upon him to speak.

Mr. J. F. HOPE (Sheffield, Brightside) said the conversation to which the hon. Member referred had reference to a private Bill.

Mr. WHITLEY said he would be satisfied if the hon. Member for the Kirkdale Division denied that the noble Lord asked him to speak on the Amendment.

Mr. DAVID MACIVER said the noble Lord spoke to him with reference to the Mersey Docks and Harbour Bill, and nothing else.

Mr. WHITLEY asked whether he was to understand that the noble Lord said nothing with reference to taking part in the debate.

*Mr. DAVID. MACIVER: The noble Lord asked me how long the Mersey Docks and Harbour Bill was likely to take. The conversation had nothing whatever to do with any other matter.

Mr. WHITLEY said that on that statement he was quite willing to withdraw his remark, though he thought there must be some connection between the Mersey Docks Bill and the celebrated warming pan in "Pickwick."

Mr. SPEAKER: This is really not relevant to the question before the House.

Mr. WHITLEY asked whether, inasmuch as time had on various occasions been wasted by deliberate obstruction on the other side, the Prime Minister would guarantee that nothing of the kind would be allowed during the short period allotted to the Report stage. The right hon. Gentleman appeared to be quite willing to cut down the time, and at the same time to allow hours to be wasted by his own supporters at the commencement of the sitting and immediately after dinner. Many Members were perfectly prepared to sit after midnight to discuss the Bill, and that, he thought, was a very fair offer to make. But there was not much chance of the offer being accepted, as they all knew what happened in connection with the Budget when arrangements had been made for a late sitting. The Prime Minister's own supporters failed him——

Mr. SPEAKER: I hope the hon. Member will address himself in a businesslike way to the question before the House.

Mr. WHITLEY said that when there were other methods by which business could be got through it made one feel very strongly with reference to the course of action adopted by the right hon. Gentleman. However, it was no good arguing the matter with the Government; they had made up their minds that the Bill should not be discussed, but he thought the Opposition had given clear notice that they would not recognise any Parliamentary title whatever in the decisions come to under such circumstances.

Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE pointed out that in connection with the Home Rule Bill two closure Resolutions were proposed—one dealing with Committee, and the other, moved when the Committee stage was concluded, with Report. That, he thought, was the more businesslike way of proceeding, because until the Committee stage had been dealt with, it was impossible to say how long was required for the consideration of questions left undiscussed. For instance, on Clauses 2 and 3, the most important Amendments would be at the end of Clause 2 and the beginning of Clause 3. They would all be left over, because the questions to be dealt with at the beginning of Clause 2 were of such substance that they could not be passed unnoticed. The Prime Minister was too apt to forget that, in addition to being the Leader of a Party, he was also the Leader of the House of Commons, in which position it was his duty, after the conclusion of the Committee stage, to go through the questions undiscussed, and to allot to their consideration such a period of time as, based upon an impartial consideration of their importance, would suffice for their proper discussion. But that could not be done until the Committee stage was concluded, and one could see what questions remained untouched. It was found in connection with the Home Rule Bill that a separate Resolution for the Report stage did not involve a great expenditure of time, but it enabled a much better use to be made of the period allotted to discussion, as the House knew exactly the questions they had still to consider. The Prime Minister said that the Opposition were making contradictory Resolutions, but the right hon. Gentleman appeared to forget that the Amendment to omit the Committee stage had been rejected. Consequently they were entitled to plead for freedom of debate at some stage of this Bill. If the Government had resolved that there should be no discussion on the Committee stage, surely they ought to allow ample discussion upon the Report stage. Even the hon. and gallant Member for Clare suggested that if the Members of the Opposition would wait until the Report stage the Government might consider it advisable to allow more time for that stage of the Bill. Seeing that the Government had not responded to that appeal, all they could do now was to protest at every stage of this Resolution and take the opinion of the House upon it with a view of afterwards taking the opinion of the country.

Dr. HUTCHINSON (Sussex, Rye) said he was returned as a Member of the House of Commons about fifteen months ago, and a licence was then given to him to take part in the debates in the House. That licence was now being taken away from him by this Resolution for no ill-conduct, and he wanted to know what compensation the Prime Minister was going to give him for taking away his licence. A great many important sections of the community had been heard upon this Bill, including the representatives of the Bishops, the clergy, and also the teetotalers, sitting on the Opposition side of the House.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member must confine himself to the Amendment, and he is not at liberty to make a speech upon the Bill generally.

DR. HUTCHINSON said that he had no intention of discussing the Bill generally, and all he wanted to bring in at the end was that there was another small section of the community in this country who had not had their say in regard to this Bill—he meant the medical profession. [MINISTERIAL laughter.] Hon. Members opposite laughed now at the mention of the medical profession, but the moment would come to every Member of the House when he would not want either Prime Ministers or Colonial Secretaries, and when the one man he would want would be a medical man. Hon. Members would probably remember the lines of the poet:—

God and the doctor men adore,
When sickness comes, but not before;
When health returns and ills are righted,
God is forgotten, the doctor slighted.

If there was one body of men more than another who were brought face to face with this question it was the medical profession, and he thought that ample time ought to be given so that the voice of that section of the community for whom he spoke could be heard upon this Bill.

Question put.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Mr. Yoxall and Mr. Samuel Evans.

MR. SPEAKER stated that a number of Amendments of which notice had been given proposing alterations in line 2 of the Resolution were not in order. The next Amendment which was in order stood in name of the hon. Member for North-West Lanarkshire.

MR. CHARLES DOUGLAS (Lanarkshire, N.W.), who had given notice of an Amendment to leave out "on six allotted days" in line 3, asked if he might move to leave out the word "on," reserving other questions to be dealt with by subsequent Amendments.

MR. SPEAKER said the object of the hon. Member's Amendment, and also of several others, was really to get rid of the word "six."

MR. CHARLES DOUGLAS said there was a more general object in the Amendment, namely, not to decide at this stage how many days were to be occupied, but to reserve that point for a later period.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member's Amendment is to leave out "on six allotted days." The other Amendments are to leave out "six" and to substitute certain other numbers. In each case the object is to get rid of the word "six."

MR. CHARLES DOUGLAS said he would not move his Amendment.

DR. MACNAMARA moved to leave out "six" in line 3, and insert "eighteen." He was most anxious that they should have an opportunity of pressing the Prime Minister to make some extension of the number of days. He would remind the right hon. Gentleman that many of his supporters had very great misgivings in voting with him for closure by compartments, and with the exception of two they had strongly urged him to widen the scheme of compartments. The right hon. Gentleman had based his proposal to some extent on precedents set by his own and preceding Governments. But there was nothing in these precedents anything like so drastic as the scheme now proposed. In connection with the Crimes Bill of 1887 they had fifteen days in Committee before the closure by compartments scheme was brought forward. The Home Rule Bill had been twenty-eight days in Committee before closure by compartments was proposed. On the Education Bill of 1902 they were thirty-eight days in Committee before closure by compartments was enforced, and then seven days in Committee alone were given, and four days on Report, while the Third Reading was left entirely out of the time limit. After citing these facts he thought the right hon. Gentleman would see that there was no case in which the closure by compartments had been moved so soon and so closely, and with so short an amount of time between the Committee and Report stage. And there was no precedent for taking the closure on the Third Reading. In regard to this Bill, they had been told that it had been thirty-four hours in Committee. He thought that that was not quite correct. It had been only thirty hours in Committee. The right hon. Gentleman proposed to give four days more, one of which must be a Friday—which would only be five hours for that day—and two days for Report, and one of these days would also be a Friday, which would amount to twelve and a half hours. That would mean that thirty-seven and a half hours would be given for discussion under closure by compartments. Then, on the Third Reading there was to be one day, or seven and a half hours. The total time, therefore, occupied by the Bill from beginning to end, with the closure by compartments and prior to its being enforced, would, roughly speaking, be seventy-five hours. Could the Prime Minister honestly say that that was enough ?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR : Do you include the First and Second Readings ?

Dr. MACNAMARA said no. But he would take twenty-five hours for the First and Second Readings and that would make 100 hours. Did the Prime Minister tell the House that 100 hours for all the stages for this Bill was anything approaching a reasonable time in which to discuss it ? He moved his Motion because substantially every speaker, with the exception of two on the right hon. Gentleman's own side of the House, was in favour of a more generous extension of the time limit, and no precedent had been put forward for so drastic a scheme as this. He begged to move.

Amendment proposed—

"In line 3, to leave out the word 'six,' and insert the word 'eighteen."—(Dr. Macnamara.)

*Mr. EMMOTT (Oldham) said he desired to second the Amendment. He was very glad to find that the hon. Member had increased the time of his proposal from ten to eighteen days, which made the Amendment equivalent to what he himself intended to have moved. The hon. Member had talked about precedents, but he was afraid that this was not so much a matter of precedent, as that the Government imagined that for their own sakes they must pass this Bill into law under conditions which would limit the session to the 12th of August. The conditions could leave no doubt in the mind of any clear-minded person that this discussion was to be crowded into an altogether inadequate period. The questions which had been raised were of enormous importance, and the idea of suppressing the discussion on Clauses 2 and 3 into one day was perfectly absurd. The questions arising on these clauses were of such far-reaching importance that the House ought to have several days in which to discuss them adequately. If the time fixed were ten days it would even then be inadequate, but if it were eighteen days it would give them a much better chance of adequate discussion.

Mr. COHEN (Islington, E.) said he had listened to the speech of the hon. Member for North Camberwell, with admiration, because the hon. Member had suggested what he thought would have been a valuable argument for a reasonable Amendment. But it was ridiculous to suggest that the extension of the time limit should be not from six to ten days, but to eighteen days. He himself hoped that the Prime Minister would extend the time limit proposed, but the Amendment of the hon. Member, if he insisted upon it, was calculated to defeat the end he had in view.

MR. LAMBERT (Devonshire, South Molton) said they ought not to be afraid to ask the House of Commons to sit for twelve more days. They ought to understand really what they were passing. He did not believe that anyone who read the Bill through knew what it meant. The senior Member for Oldham had spoken of the discussion on Clauses 2 and 3 being pressed into one day. He had made a calculation as to how many hours they would have to discuss these two clauses of this revolutionary measure. They would have from three o'clock to 7.30, which was four and a half hours for the most important clause in the Bill, because it endeavoured to show what amount of compensation would be obtained for the refusal of a licence. It was perfectly evident to any fair-minded and reasonable man that it was absolutely impossible for the House to discuss that important clause in four and a half hours. Speeches might be limited as much as they pleased, but not half of the Amendments, even from the Government side of the House, would be reached. Seventeen of the Amendments on Clause 2 were proposed by hon. Gentlemen opposite. If each Gentlemen occupied a quarter of an hour the whole of the time would have been exhausted. He asked the Prime Minister himself if he quite knew how much this Bill was going to increase the value of the licensed property of the country. Nobody had been able to tell them. They had had various estimates ranging from £100,000,000 to over £300,000,000. The vital Amendment which would give some information as to the amount of compensation that was to be paid ought certainly not be scamped. Many good supporters of the Government, including its most pathetic supporters, the Member for Plymouth, the right hon. Member for Oxford, the hon. and learned Member for Stretford, and the right hon. Member for East Somerset, one of the most reasonable Members of the House, wanted an extension of time. But it was impossible for their Amendments to be reached if the Prime Minister's proposal to devote only four and a half hours to this compartment were carried. The whole thing was a mockery and a sham. He asked the Prime Minister in the interests not only of his own Bill but of the dignity of the House to give a fair amount of time for the discussion of this important matter. He was sure the right hon. Gentlemen's own constituents would not blame him if he said that he was going to make the House of Commons sit from the 12th to the 24th August in order to get the Licensing Bill discussed in a proper and workmanlike fashion. He therefore trusted the right hon. Gentleman would assent to the Amendment of his hon. friend.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said that when the hon. Member talked about the absurdity of asking the House to pass such a Resolution, it showed that he was a very young Member of the House. He could not have taken part in the proceedings in regard to the closure on the Home Rule Bill.

MR. LAMBERT : Certainly I did.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : Do my ears deceive me ? Does the hon. Gentleman say he was present and yet talk about the dignity of the House and the absurdity of the present discussion of two clauses in one day ?

MR. LAMBERT said he did not think the right hon. Gentleman would find a precedent in the Home Rule Bill discussion which compressed a single clause into four and a half hours.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said that when the hon. Gentleman talked about the dignity of the House of Commons and of the absurdity of asking the House to discuss the questions which would be included in these compartments within the limit of time proposed, he certainly could not have taken part in the proceedings on the great closure of the Home Rule Bill by Mr. Gladstone.

Mr. LAMBERT: Oh, yes I did, and I voted for it.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: And yet the hon. Member talks about the dignity of the House and the absurdity of compressing Clauses 1 and 2 of the Licensing Bill into one day.

Mr. LAMBERT: I do not think the right hon. Gentleman will find a single precedent in the Home Rule Bill closure for compressing a single clause into four hours and a half.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR said he thought the hon. Gentleman had quite forgotten what the closure on the Home Rule Bill did. He would remind the hon. Gentleman that the Home Rule Bill proposed to give a new Constitution not only to this country but to Ireland, and that among the things which were not discussed because they were stopped by closure was the composition of the Irish Legislative Chamber, and of the Irish Legislative Council, and what was to be done in the case of disagreements between those two hypothetical bodies. All that was in the first compartment. He had described yesterday what happened in the second compartment, in which no less than eighteen clauses, each one of which was a Bill in itself, were compressed into five days. The hon. Gentleman might truly say that that was a different arrangement from this. Mr. Gladstone, naturally enough, and he thought he should have done the same thing in his place, thought it more convenient to have big batches of clauses stuck into compartments of four or five days, rather than, as he had now done with a very limited Bill, to have the compartments more restricted in length and the subjects much smaller. But if the hon. Gentleman would do the simple sum in arithmetic to which he had called attention yesterday, he would see that to discuss eighteen clauses in five days was to require the discussion of more than three clauses per diem on an average, and those clauses were not unimportant; they were not machinery clauses, but clauses connected with the constitution of a wholly new organic law.

Mr. LAMBERT: We had a mandate and you have not.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: Does the hon Gentleman say that his Party had a mandate for squeezing all these clauses into five days?

Mr. LAMBERT: A mandate for the Home Rule——

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: That is not what we are arguing; but whether the House can discuss a given subject in a given time. On that point, which was the only one before them, the hon. Gentleman was good enough to say that the Government had been totally regardless of the dignity of the House, and had made utterly absurd proposals. He was pointing out that if the dignity of the House was affected by this proposal ten thousand times more was Mr. Gladstone's closure open to the same charge.

Mr. LAMBERT: We sat till September.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR said the hon. Gentleman's point, as he understood it, was that they were restricting discussion, but he did not think he need deal with that part of the subject at greater length. In the speech in which he introduced this Motion he had even hinted that he thought this method of closure by compartments an extremely clumsy method of procedure, and it was his firm conviction that some day this question would have to be taken in hand, and they would have to find some more flexible and more convenient method by which the time of the House should be allocated as between the different elements of the Government programme. The difficulties were obviously enormous. because, to start with, they must have a Government programme which was reasonable in dimensions; he did not mean to say, of course, reasonable in substance, because to an Opposition no Government programme was reasonable in substance. Then they would have to find some mechanism for allocating the debates so that every question of importance should be debated and no trivial question debated. Alas, they were far from that now, and he did not deny that the evils inherent in this method of dealing with business affected the proposals he had made to the House, as they had affected the other proposals of a similar kind made in the past, and as they doubtless would affect other proposals of that kind made in the future. Until that great reform or alteration which he had adumbrated was accepted by that Assembly, which he supposed was in some respects, as regarded its rules, the most conservative Assembly in the world, and, while admitting frankly that his proposals were open to objection, he asked whether they should not under the circumstances be passed. He had considered and reconsidered the matter, and he sympathised with the desire of some hon. Members that there should be an extension of time, though not to the extent proposed in the Amendment, which was extreme even to absurdity. Given that the House had already decided that there should be a time limit to this Bill, on the whole he was inclined to think that the House would be well-advised to adhere to the limits originally laid down by the Government. By the addition of a few hours he did not believe any advantage would be secured to the Opposition, who had already announced their intention of not feeling themselves bound by this Bill. He did not think that in any circumstances they would be bound, but at all events no change in their attitude could be expected in return for anything in the nature of a slight modification of the scheme, which, after careful thought, he had laid on the Table of the House. They must have regard to the whole circumstances of the session. As far as he was concerned he certainly did not wish to overburden the House, but, even with any diminution which he might be able to make in the Government programme, he did not think it would be possible for them to rise before the day on which as a rule they had been able to rise during the last eight years, and even then he thought he was understating the case. Having regard to all those circumstances, much would be lost and nothing gained by any attempt to modify the Resolution he had moved. He had come to the conclusion with reluctance, but he hoped at all events his friends on that side would feel that it was through no desire for rash and arbitrary proceedings that he had taken the course he had. He was convinced it was the course which, on the whole, would be most useful in the public interests, and in the interests of the House and of the Members.

SIR ROBERT REID said he would not follow the Prime Minister into his forecast as to the period of the session, nor with regard to the precedent of the Home Rule Bill. The right hon. Gentleman at the time expressed his disapproval in warm terms of that precedent; and what was the use of bringing it forward now, unless, as he did not believe, the Prime Minister was stating deliberately what he thought to be unjust, wrong, and unfair. The right hon. Gentleman apparently indicated, just now, that there might be some possible willingness on his part to make a concession, if an indication were given of any change of temper and disposition on the part of the Opposition. He had two thoughts in reference to the Licensing Bill in connection with the Prime Minister. The first was that, with all his avocations, the right hon. Gentleman had not been able to penetrate to the core of the Bill. It was only after considerable study of its voluminous and important innovations that one could understand how deep it struck, and how dangerous it might be. His other thought with regard to the Prime Minister was that he did not realise the state of feeling in reference to the Bill. It appeared to be an axiom with regard to licensing legislation that every teetotaler was an extreme man; but many who were not teetotalers regarded the Bill as full of the gravest possible dangers. If the right hon. Gentleman realised that, he would not have talked about a few days more or less in comparison with the convenience of the House. No one wanted to overwork Ministers, or to deprive Members generally of the opportunity of enjoying some part of the summer in the country; but nothing of that kind was comparable to the vast questions involved in the Bill. It touched the liquor traffic and the licensing system at every point, as all experts could assure the right hon. Gentleman. The question was whether the time proposed was sufficient to allow the House to properly discuss the Bill. The Prime Minister did not say that it was sufficient. He did not think that the Prime Minister, as a gentleman of honour and as one responsible to the House and the country for such an important change in the law, would say that he really believed that the time proposed was sufficient. The right hon. Gentleman, however, seemed to think that there was some overwhelming necessity for curtailing discussion in order to wind up the session. That was neither a statesmanlike nor a fair attitude on the part of the Leader of the House. In the first clause there were sixteen points of far-reaching importance, and they would have to be discussed in one day. Supposing the Committee wished to divide on these points, the divisions alone, without any discussion whatever, would take three hours. He excluded any suspicion, although he did not know why he should, that those who wished to prevent any changes in the tenor of the Bill would occupy their time in discussing earlier and less important points. That was a danger that had to be faced. All this had to be dealt with in one day, and the same observation might be made with regard to the other clauses as a whole. The whole Bill from beginning to end was to be passed through the Report stage in two days. Discussion was impossible under such conditions. The Prime Minister had, however, refused to make any concession, although for his part he thought eighteen days would be very usefully occupied in discussing the measure. He felt that there was at stake something even more serious than the Bill. The House of Commons would not remain a deliberative assembly of any practical value if a limitation of this kind upon its time was imposed. The Prime Minister had not said that he believed the time allowed was sufficient, and he had given no reason for his proposal other than the convenience of Members of the House. He ventured to submit that that was not an attitude which the Prime Minister ought to take up.

Mr. HENRY HOBHOUSE (Somersetshire, E.) agreed that the Prime Minister was not likely to win gratitude from the Opposition, no matter how much time he might give for the discussion of the Bill. But there was something else than the gratitude of the Opposition; there was the decency of debate and the satisfaction of the country. The majority of the people of the country consisted of moderate men, who would be much better satisfied with the Bill if they knew that it had been adequately discussed in the House of Commons. It would greatly assit hon. Members to explain to their constituents the attitude taken up by the Government if more time were allowed for discussion. Assuming that the Resolution were passed that day, to-morrow would be the first allotted day and Friday next would be the second allotted day, and they would have to dispose of Clauses 2 and 3 in four and a half hours. When Estimates were before the House Friday was never considered a whole day, and he submitted that it would not be fair to make it an allotted day in this case. Clauses 2 and 3 covered the whole question of compensation, a most debateable question, on which strong feelings were held throughout the country, and a question on which great doubt and obscurity prevailed in the House as to what the Bill itself actually meant. He asked whether the Prime Minister could not give one or two full days for that most important subject.

Mr. McKENNA said the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had spoken in so moderate and temperate a manner that in an ordinary case they might have hoped that the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister would have made the concession for which he had been asked, but the House had to remember that the most important parts of the Bill had not been discussed, and when the right hon. Member for Somerset pointed out that Clauses 2 and 3 would be discussed on Friday next, he put his finger not on the weak but on the strong spot. They were not intended to be discussed. There was on the Paper an Amendment put down on the part of the Government in respect of compensation. Why was not that in the Bill itself? They could pretty well gather the reason why it was put down now. It was put down because of an election that was now taking place. In the request he had made, the right hon. Gentleman was asking the Government to forego the main ground for their proposal. The Prime Minister had guaranteed that the difficult question which might divide the publican from the brewer should not be raised, and that it should only be from bitter experience of the working of the measure, after the general election, that the publican should find out that it was disastrous to him. Six days only were to be given to the House to dispose of a great public property. A property estimated at £300,000,000 was to be given away to the trade, and the right hon. Gentleman suggested that that was a reasonable proposal to make. What sort of a title were the brewers to get under this Bill? The right hon. Gentleman quoted the precedent of the Home Rule Bill, but the right hon. Gentleman and his friends then relied on another place to reject the measure on the ground that it had not been adequately discussed. They could not rely on another place on this occasion, but they would ask the judgment of the people upon the Parliamentary title which the Prime Minister was giving the brewers to a great public property estimated at £300,000,000 sterling. He was satisfied that the right hon. Gentleman was doing a bad day's business for the brewers by this procedure, because he was giving the country, and a future Government, a reason for upsetting that Parliamentary title. The Prime Minister was going beyond all precedents; he was limiting discussion, taking away the liberties of Members, and transferring public property; and the effect of his action would be to destroy the value which had hitherto attached to a Parliamentary title.

Mr. GIBSON BOWLES expressed his regret that the debate had started and was being continued on the lines of Party recrimination. The Prime Minister had spoken of the proceedings of the House becoming "wearisome and nauseous." Personally, when he heard these accusations bandied about from one side to the other he felt not weariness, but attenuation, and not nausea, but the next disagreeable stage which sometimes followed upon it. He began to doubt whether, in any discussion whatever, it would be possible to keep Ministers to the merits of the question at issue; certainly these Party recriminations were not relevant, and they did not add to the usefulness of the debates. He was sorry to hear the Prime Minister predict another dose of new rules. He would have thought the right hon. Gentleman's experience in that direction would have deterred him from making another attempt. It was because the new rules had failed in their purpose that the present Resolution had been brought forward. The proposal before the House was no ordinary "closure by compartments." No dates whatever were fixed; the days were to be chosen by the right hon. Gentleman himself, and might be sandwiched in wherever the Prime Minister pleased. There was no security that the allotted days would not go beyond even the sacred 12th August, which the right hon. Gentleman appeared to worship in his most secret devotions The Amendment proposed to treble the number of days on which Members were to be placed absolutely at the command of the Government; therefore he would prefer six to eighteen. If the word "six" were agreed to, it would be useless to urge any subsequent extension of time for a particular stage of the Bill, as whatever was added to one portion would have to be taken from another. But it was evident that the Prime Minister had finally determined that the number of days should be six and no more. Friday was not likely to be one of the allotted days, as the right hon. Gentleman's supporters were usually in the country on that day golfing or motoring. Monday also was likely to be exempt, as hon. Members were not generally in attendance with sufficient strength to save the Government without the assistance of the Peckham janissaries. The determination to adhere to the proposed number of days, and to the system of scattering those days at will over the remainder of the session, was an absolute avowal that there was no urgency for the passing of the Bill.

Sir EDWARD GREY (Northumberland, Berwick) shared the impatience of the hon. Member for Lynn Regis with regard to the use of the tu quoque argument, especially on the part of the Prime Minister. The tu quoque argument, to be effective at all, should compare like with like, but there was no comparison whatever between the Home Rule Bill, to which the right hon. Gentleman had referred, and the measure now concerned. In the former case the Opposition had made it perfectly clear that they would not seriously debate the measure before the House; in the present case nothing of the sort had happened. The speech of the hon. Member the present Parliamentary Secretary to the Local Government Board alone was a justification for strong measures in connection with the Home Rule Bill. The Prime Minister persistently ignored the fact that so far as the Committee stage in the Licensing Bill had gone, the division of speeches was nearly equal between the two sides of the House, and that certainly was not the case with the Home Rule Bill. He had little hope of influencing the Prime Minister, as the Bill was not really in his mind. It was not the convenience of the House, but the convenience of his own side of the House, that the right hon. Gentleman was considering. The Bill had to be forced through while he could count on their support. It was that fact that created the great gulf between the Opposition and the Prime Minister. The right hon. Gentleman had not gauged what the opposition to the Bill really was. The measure filled the minds of many Members with despair. Its scope was not merely large; it was eternal; and for the consideration of such a measure a fixed limit of six days was to be allotted. If there was to be any discussion at all, six days was an absurdly inadequate period. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Somersetshire had made an appeal as a moderate man. Now, if ever, was the opportunity for moderate men to assert themselves. The country was beginning to feel that appeals from "moderate men" had fallen rather flat. The "moderate men" were coming to be looked upon as those who contented themselves with expressing their opinion but never enforcing it. One man might play a useful part, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Somersetshire had often done but moderate men were of no use unless they acted in bulk. Never had moderate men been at such a discount in public life as at present. Let them show the House what they could do in the way of securing time for the adequate discussion of this Bill. It was true that the Prime Minister would not gain the gratitude of the Opposition by extending the period by two or three days, but that was because he had shown no disposition to accept reasonable Amendments to the Bill. Further discussion was useless unless it was to be accompanied by a reasonable spirit in the conduct of the Bill. The rigid and ruthless attitude taken up by the Prime Minister made any gratitude on the part of the Opposition impossible. If the Government used their majority to pass this Bill as it stood in order to secure immunity from discussion, he agreed that under those circumstances the Opposition would not consider themselves bound by this Bill.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR said his right hon. friend the Member for East Somersetshire addressed an appeal to him not to make Friday one of the allotted days.

Mr. HENRY HOBHOUSE: Not to make Friday the second allotted day.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR said there were certain Amendments on the Paper raising this question in which the right hon. Gentleman took a great interest. If it would meet the general views of the House, he would undertake that Friday should not be one of the allotted days.

Mr. LOUGH (Islington, W.) said this was the most important Amendment they had got to discuss. With regard to the precedent of the Home Rule Bill, which had been quoted by the Prime Minister, he wished to point out that that was the twenty-sixth Home Rule Bill passed by the House of Commons. There were twenty-five other Home Rule Bills before that, and none of them were closured. The effect of the last closure moved by the Prime Minister in regard to the Education Bill ought not to be overlooked. It had caused so much commotion in the country that they might almost say that they had been plunged into a small revolution. In consequence of the discussion having been cut short on the Education Bill 22,000 summonses had been issued under that Act, 1 000 seizures of goods had been made, and twenty or thirty people had been sent to prison. He invited the Prime Minister to look at the important results which had been achieved by the discussion which had already taken place upon the first three lines of the Bill. During that discussion the character of the public-house as a place of refreshment had been entirely altered, and there had also been an Amendment put down by the Government dealing with the distribution of compensation. Every argument brought forward by the Opposition on these questions was rejected at first, and after the debate when the country and the Government came to consider the question they found a long Amendment down on the Paper which entirely altered the position. That result showed that large issues might arise when they came to a close discussion of the Bill. They were being asked to dispose of the whole Committee stage in four days, and he appealed to the right hon. Gentleman to allow more time for the discussion of the details. He was aware that the right hon. Gentleman had to do his duty by the Party which supported him, but he had almost admitted that he was forcing matters too much and that the time was too short. Finally the right hon. Gentleman stated that his reason for not making any concession was that the Opposition would not be grateful. Why should they be grateful because they were constantly being ground down by the Government. If the Prime Minister felt that the time he was allowing was too short and the speeches would be too long he owed it to the position he occupied to widen that time.

SIR JOHN GORST (Cambridge University) pointed out that if the six allotted days were adhered to there would be one matter which would not be discussed at all and that was the amount of compensation. That was a very vital question in the Bill, because it was giving away what was the property of the people themselves. Therefore, this was a question which ought not to be settled without adequate discussion. As matters stood now this important question would never be discussed at all. There were numerous Amendments down and nobody appeared to know what the Government proposal really meant. He was quite sure that few lawyers would be able to interpret what the clause meant. The Amendments put down to Clause 2 came at the end, and therefore they had no chance of being reached. This method of closure by compartments was a clumsy one; it did not secure that the time allotted for discussion should be devoted to the more important Amendments, and the whole of the time might be wasted upon Amendments of less importance. That was the usual result of the operation of the closure. On the first allotted day of the Report stage, the new clauses, and then Clauses 1, 2, and 3, were to be taken, and under those circumstances what chance was there of Amendments relating to compensation being discussed? If those Amendments were not discussed, the Bill would part with a valuable property belonging to the people of this country, and would vest that property in the trade—[MINISTERIAL cries of "No, no!"]—and they would do that without the representatives of the people having had the opportunity of discussing or considering this question. That was what would happen, and it would be a perfect scandal. What the value of the property was which was going to be disposed of in this way nobody was able to say. Some eminent gentlemen estimated its value at £3,000,000, but, at any rate, the rise in the value of brewery shares, in consequence of the expectation that this Bill would pass, amounted to more than £1,000,000. Therefore, they might take it that the property at stake amounted to several millions, which was to be divided between the trade and the people, and the latter had a right to expect that their representatives would be heard upon it. He asked the Prime Minister to so modify the terms of this Resolution as to secure that part of the allotted time should be devoted to the discussion of this most important question, which he did not think the Government, or those who represented the interests of the brewers in this House, would deny was a matter of extreme importance. He had always supported the idea of doing perfect justice to those engaged in the trade, but surely the question of how much was to be given was one which ought to be discussed and upon which the representatives of the people ought to have the opportunity of expressing their views.

MR. ELLIS GRIFFITH (Anglesey) said that the discussion which had already taken place must have convinced everybody that the case against the Government was overwhelming. He did not think that the Prime Minister for a moment would suggest that the Bill could be adequately discussed in the time placed at their disposal under this Resolution. The issue they had to discuss now was whether there was any necessity to limit the discussion to six days. The speeches from both sides of the House must have convinced the right hon. Gentleman that the Bill could not be adequately discussed in the time at their disposal. He was not going to take part in the argument about precedents, except to say that the Prime Minister had used strong language on that subject. In 1894, speaking upon a similar Resolution, the right hon. Gentleman said—

> "Indulge in this petty and sordid trafficking for votes if you like, but do not ask us to help you to make the honour and the dignity and the traditions of this House counters in the sorry game you are playing for political support."

Was this Bill not a petty sordid trafficking for votes? Why should the right hon. Gentleman expect them to assist him in arriving at a satisfactory agreement with brewers for whom this Bill was intended? There was no necessity resting upon the Prime Minister to compress the discussion into six days. His complaint against the Prime Minister was twofold—first of all that he did not begin the Bill early enough, and, secondly, that he would not go on late enough. The discussion was to be bounded on one side by Ascot, and on the other side by grouse shooting. That was the necessity which compelled him to limit the discussion to six days. There was really no necessity that the House should rise on the 12th of August. He noticed that in 1894 the present Prime Minister spoke of there being something more important than personal ease and convenience. He had not heard the right hon. Gentleman speak of anything so important as the ease and convenience of his own followers. He submitted that if the Prime Minister was in earnest in wanting a serious discussion of this measure the only way he could have it was to let the House sit a week or so beyond the usual allotted time. If he could get his own followers to do that he need not trouble about the Opposition side of the House in the event of his granting that concession. The right hon. Gentleman might depend upon their being at their posts.

Mr. TRITTON (Lambeth, Norwood) said many hon. Members thought six days too short a time for the discussion of this measure, and he would ask the Prime Minister to consider the appeal made to him by the hon. Member for East Somerset and to see whether he could not give one or two more days.

Mr. CHARLES DOUGLAS said he was afraid they must give up hope of getting any concession from the Prime Minister. The right hon. Gentleman had founded himself on what he was pleased to call precedent, and he had done so wisely because there was nothing in which he was happier than in defending the attitude he had taken up. Possibly he believed it made it right if he showed how it was parallel to actions which at other times he had condemned in the strongest terms. The Prime Minister said at an earlier stage of the discussion that they should take each case entirely on its merits. They had not got clearly from the Prime Minister what his opinion was of the merits of this case. The right hon. Gentleman had never argued throughout his speeches that this Bill could be adequately discussed in the time he had allotted for its discussion. They must make clear the ground on which they opposed his action. It was impossible for them to discuss the Bill in the time allowed to them. He would name a few of the subjects which still remained to be discussed. They were still discussing the delimitation of the spheres of the two licensing authorities. They had to consider a matter which in the Licensing Act for Scotland last year the Government did not think unworthy of attention—the introduction of a representative element into the licensing authority. They had to consider a matter which in the minds of temperance reformers had always been connected with any question of compensation—that was the statutory reduction of licences and the establishment of a maximum ratio of licences to population. Reference had already been made to the quite inadequate time allowed for the discussion of compensation. Nobody knew precisely what the proposal of the Bill was. They would certainly not have time to approach, in the days allowed by the Prime Minister, the questions that had to be dealt with under compensation, for the compensation method which this Bill adopted could not, as had already been made quite apparent in the discussion, be isolated, and taken by itself, and separated from the larger questions in relation to licences. The moment the question of compensation was introduced they came at once into contact with large social questions raised by our licensing system. The Bill raised questions which could not be settled within the narrow limits set down in the Resolution. Another set of questions on which there had been practically no discussion were those raised by Clause 4 as to the treatment and disposition of new licences. Under the Resolution these questions were to be dealt with in a single day. It was impossible to maintain that that was adequate time for their discussion. Then there were questions as to whether there should be a system of high licence, or whether a system of disinterested public management was to be adopted—questions which ought to be dealt with in a Bill which was to revolutionise and set up side by side with the old licences a different tenure for new licences. These were questions which the Government proposed they should deal with in perhaps four-and-a-half hours. It was impossible to legislate properly on these matters in the time allowed for discussion by the Resolution. On these grounds they felt bound to press for very different limits from those which were suggested.

On the Opposition side of the House they could not hope for concessions from the Prime Minister, but supporters of the Government should endeavour to obtain from him some concessions, for they had said in plain terms that they did not believe the time allowed to be adequate. Their methods were not sufficiently active to be successful with the Prime Minister. On the Opposition side of the House they had often regarded the supporters of the Government as good men struggling with adversity, but the complaint they felt bound to make now was that in the present instance they were not even struggling. They had object lessons before their eyes as to how the Prime Minister could be moved. They knew how different was the treatment accorded to hon. Members from Ireland and Scotland in matters relating to the management of the business of the House. He would take another instance. Let them compare the treatment accorded to tariff reformers with that given to free-traders. Let them remember the great precedent of what perhaps he might be allowed to call the "Wharton Amendment," when 112 staunch men sent a stern message to the Prime Minister and got their way. He did not know whether there were 112 temperance reformers on the other side, but a much smaller number would serve. He was quite sure that if they would let their minds be clearly known and make it appear that they had wills they would also get a little of their own way. He was afraid that they still harboured the delusion that the Prime Minister was amenable to kindness. Many of the lower animals were ruled by kindness, but the teaching of history was that very few Prime Ministers indeed, and certainly not the present Prime Minister, responded to such treatment. He urged his hon. friends opposite not to be satisfied with the two hours they had already obtained so far, but to push for very much more in the direction of what was required.

*Mr. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) said he did not rise for the purpose of making any appeal to the Prime Minister. This debate had been left to moderate men, and he should be very anxious to see the result of it. He rose for the purpose of calling attention from the historical aspect to the futility of all these proceedings. Let them take the precedent of the Evicted Tenants Bill. The precedent of the Evicted Tenants Bill had been quoted. The Prime Minister resisted the closure of that Bill in 1895. It would be interesting for hon. Gentlemen who expended a great deal of eloquence against the closuring of that Bill to remember that this Government had as the result of that closuring settled the evicted tenants question nine years afterwards on far more liberal terms than had been proposed by the right hon. Member for Montrose. Take the Parnell Commission. That was closured by the right hon. Gentlemen on his own side of the House. It was discussed at great length—far longer than this Bill had been discussed—and those extreme proposals discussed at inordinate length he admitted did not serve any good purpose whatever. They settled nothing. They left everything unsettled and Mr. Parnell emerged from that scene absolutely triumphant. Take the Home Rule Bill. It was discussed for eighty-two days. This Bill had been discussed thirty-four hours. It was closured and the present Ministerialist Party resisted the closure. Could hon. Gentlemen devise a better means of bringing about Home Rule than by making that House into a machine. That was all they got by passing those closuring Resolutions. Take the Education Bill, discussed for thirty-eight days and closured at the end of that time. Did hon. Members on the Government side believe that the education question was settled by that closure? Did not everybody know that the education question would rise at the next general election and Members would have to answer for what they did? Not one of those violent measures produced the result that people thought they produced, and they might depend upon it that in this case it would be the same thing.

What was the plain statement made by right hon. Gentlemen sitting on the Front Opposition Bench? It was said that afternoon by one of the ablest and most far-seeing men who sat on the Bench that this Bill in itself was bad enough, but disposed of as it had been and was proposed to be disposed of further by this Resolution, they owed it no allegiance whatever. Why should hon. Members on the Government Benches proceed to those methods of throttling debate without sufficient discussion? Why should they resort to those methods when the whole history of those things told them that they were absolutely futile and that the people of England could not be controlled as the Government controlled their obedient majority. For his part he had no reason to make any appeal to the right hon. Gentleman, and he rejoiced to think that none of those who were called extreme temperance men had risen that afternoon to make any. He thought the time allotted to the Bill inadequate. He did not believe any Member of the House would contend that six days was adequate for the discussion in Committee. And what followed? Hon. Gentleman were taking upon themselves now, with the funeral knell tolling at every by-election, the responsibility of closuring a Bill without adequate discussion, and they imagined that the people of England were not looking on. What better evidence could the people of England give than they were giving that the Government had outstayed their welcome and that the Government had no moral right to do what they were doing? When the people spoke out like that, not once or twice, but for twelve long months, whenever they got a chance, the best thing the Government could do was to closure themselves and make way for other people.

Sir J. STIRLING-MAXWELL (Glasgow, College) said that this debate was the most dismal he had ever heard in the House. The Prime Minister had no concession to make and there was no expectation of any. In these circumstance, he would like to know whether, if the debate closed now, the Prime Minister would allow them this evening in addition to the six allotted days for the Committee stage. He was quite certain that the right hon. Gentleman had done everything for what he thought was the best, but it was quite impossible to vote for the Resolution for six days, which he believed was quite inadequate for a discussion of that importance.

Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE said he was glad that the hon. Gentleman opposite had come to the conclusion that it was useless to make any further appeals to the Prime Minister on this point, for the simple reason that the right hon. Gentleman was not considering for a moment the time that ought to be allotted from the point of view of the merits of the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman was allowing external considerations to influence him. The Prime Minister was giving the House the number of days in which the whole clauses of the Bill were to be discussed; but had the right hon.

Gentleman really discovered how much time he was giving to the discussion of each clause? He could hardly think so. Take the last day of all in Committee. What was proposed to be discussed was five clauses and two schedules—one of which was in the Bill, and one to be moved by the Home Secretary, which was down on the Amendment Paper. That was practically seven clauses, and how long did the House get to discuss them? Six-and-a-half hours. Supposing they had only one division on each of these clauses—there would be at least one Amendment on each clause—that left five hours for discussion, after one-and-a-half hours had been spent in divisions. Five hours for seven clauses was under fifty minutes for each clause. The right hon. Gentleman worked himself up into a pitch of righteous indignation because the late Government only allowed a day for each clause. What did he think of himself for only allowing fifty minutes for each clause. There was no comparison. He thought they were entitled to ask the Prime Minister, did he mean, upon his authority as Leader of the House, to say that, in his judgment, fifty minutes per clause was adequate? Clause 3 was in the same position. The right hon. Gentleman allowed two or three hours for discussion of Clause 2, and two or three hours for discussion of Clause 3, and for each of the rest of the clauses fifty minutes. They were entitled to ask one simple question. Did the right hon. Gentleman mean sincerely to say that in his judgment fifty minutes was sufficient and adequate? Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman was exercising a wise discretion in refusing to give an answer. He took it by the silence of the Prime Minister that the right hon Gentleman admitted that there was no answer to be given; but he was entitled to an answer to the question.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, no! I do not think the hon. Gentleman is entitled to an answer. It is not a question to be answered across the floor of the House.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: They were not entitled to ask the one question which was relevant to the whole discussion! Surely that was the whole point they were discussing. Were these six days adequate or were they not? The Prime Minister said not merely must they not discuss the point, but that they had no right to ask the question whether the right hon. Gentleman thought the time was adequate or not. He thought that was treating the House of Commons with a measure of contempt that certainly no Leader of the House had ever treated it with before. The only thing he could say was that the mere fact that the House of Commons had stood this sort of thing for session after session, and year after year, showed that the Prime Minister had taken the right measure of the House he led, and it deserved the contempt with which its Leader treated it.

*MR. MALCOLM (Suffolk, Stowmarket) said he thought that the House of Commons had a right to say that if the question of the hon. Member for Carnarvon Burghs was the only revelant question, it ought to have been asked earlier in the afternoon. He was in complete agreement with the Prime Minister in the action he had taken. He thought he had a right to tell hon. Gentlemen opposite how much they were responsible for the impasse in which they found themselves at the present time. The hon. Gentleman made a great deal of the fact that Clauses 2 and 3 would have to be discussed on Friday afternoon; but supposing the present Motion had been finished last night, as had been expected, then Clauses 2 and 3, could have been discussed to-morrow. Another way in which hon. Gentlemen opposite were responsible was by not taking trivial Amendments off the Order Paper, and then proceeding to the discussion of the more important Amendments. He agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Berwick Division, who said that all this recrimination was unnecessary. Experience showed that if a Party were determined to kill a Bill, they would succeed, even if thirty days were allowed for the Committee stage. He congratulated his right hon. friend on his Motion; and he hoped he would not accept any Amendments to it. It was perfectly obvious that whether the Opposition had three days, or thirty days, or three months their only desire was to bury the Bill.

They had no desire to better it. They had proclaimed that in the parks; their newspapers were full of their undying hostility to the measure; and yet they now asked the Prime Minister for three or four days more, with which, forsooth, they would be satisfied. It seemed to him that it was all the utmost cant. Hon. Gentlemen opposite wanted to kill the Bill; its promoters wanted to pass it into law. He most earnestly hoped that, that being the position, his right hon. friend would stick to his guns. The speeches on the other side had been very businesslike; but the business was to kill the Bill. The only Amendment he should like to see accepted was the Amendment suggested by the junior Member for Oldham, to strike out six days and substitute one day.

Mr. SAMUEL EVANS said that the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken had mistaken the position of hon. Gentlemen on that side. They did not ask for three or four more days; they demanded proper time for the discussion of the Bill. The Prime Minister would get no gratitude for doing what they considered to be his duty as Leader of the House. The right hon. Gentleman had taken away all their privileges and he expected gratitude because he might offer a few more days. The right hon. Gentleman would not get it. The hon. Gentleman who had just spoken refrained from discussing the only test as to whether he was doing his duty; and that was whether the days allotted were enough. The Prime Minister refrained from saying anything on that point. In these allotted days, six new clauses put down by the Government, and twenty other new clauses, eleven of which were put down by supporters of the Government, would have to be discussed. The hon. Gentleman did not appear to know that. He had not even attended the debate, because he himself had stated the fact previously. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Cambridge University was the only Member on the other side who had taken a right attitude on this question. But he did not put the case against the Government as strongly as it could have been put. The right hon. Gentleman said that the Amendments to Clause 2 could not be completed; but Clause 3 was also to be taken on the same day; and, therefore, Clause 3 could not be discussed at all, although it contained the financial clauses. They were getting tired of the moderate speeches which were being delivered on the other side. There should be a little mutiny. It was no use asking for days. Why not sit to the end of August, or else resume in September or October. Personally, he derived very little comfort from what had been said by his right hon. friend the Member for the Berwick Division. If they allowed the Government of the day with its sheep-like, servile majority, to act in this way, the next Liberal Government would have nothing to do but to repeal statutes. That was a very serious situation. It would not suffice to have to undo the wrongs of the present Government. Another matter was that the Liberal Party did not know whether it would or would not be supported by the Irish Members. If the Liberals tried to repeal this Bill, they would not be supported by the Irish Members. Considerations such as that ought to be taken into account when they were discussing the period of time to be allowed. Every hon. Member who had the right spirit should demand from the Prime Minister an adequate extension of time.

Sir J. FERGUSSON (Manchester, N.E.) said he thought that opinion outside the House would be that instead of discussing the number of days to be allotted, they had better get on with the business and not have speeches delivered over and over again. Thirty years ago, having returned from foreign service, he was told by a leading Member of the Party opposite that they would have to do away with the twelve o'clock rule if they wanted to get business through.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order, order! The question before the House is whether the number of days should be six or eighteen.

Sir J. FERGUSSON said he would only say in conclusion that if they were to get to business, in his opinion six days were quite sufficient to discuss this Bill.

Mr. RENWICK (Newcastle-on-Tyne) said he had no hesitation in saying that six days were ample for the discussion of this Bill. Hon. Members opposite did not think so, but he thought he could suggest a means whereby six days would be found adequate and that was by all lawyers keeping quiet during the debate on the Bill, leaving the discussion to business men. Business men would then acknowledge that six days were long enough. One of the Members of the Opposition twitted some of the supporters of the Government with having gone to Ascot. But all of them did not deserve that taunt. He did not go to Ascot. [Loud ironical cheers.] The fact that he did not go to Ascot deserved no cheering. Instead of going to Ascot he remained in the House and attended to his duties. What was more, he entered the House yesterday morning at 11.30 and did not leave it until 12.30 that morning. Thirteen hours he remained in the House listening to speeches, and at the end of it no business had been done. The House was suffering from a plethora of speeches. [Ironical cheers.] It might be that that ironical cheer arose because it was thought he intervened often in debate, but he had never said a word in regard to the Licensing Bill. He spoke very rarely in the House and whenever he did he never exceeded fifteen minutes. He ventured to say, as a business man, that if the business of the House were conducted on business lines, and the speeches restricted to fifteen or twenty minutes, six days would be ample to deal with the Bill in Committee and on Report.

SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean) protested against the hon. Member's doctrine that no lawyers should take part in this debate. The only Government speeches that were of value in this Bill, when they were allowed to discuss it, were those of the hon. and learned Solicitor-General, who all, friend and foe alike, would admit had conducted this Bill so far as it had been left in his charge with great mastery of detail and great courtesy. The hon. Member for Stowmarket and other hon. Members who had spoken seemed to think that the whole object of the scheme of the right hon. Gentleman was to obtain a reasonable discussion on the Bill. The scheme of the right hon. Gentleman on the contrary made a reasonable discussion of the vital portions of this Bill an impossibility, as was seen if they took the example of Clauses 2 and 3 which were grouped together all through the Bill. Those were the clauses dealing with that important question compensation. The end of Clause 2 dealt with the question of who was to get compensation, and the beginning of Clause dealt with the question of who was to pay it, and the Resolution of the right hon. Gentleman made it impossible to discuss these vital questions, and one reason why an extension of time was asked for was to enable Clause 3 to have a day to itself.

MR. THEODORE TAYLOR (Lancashire, Radcliffe) contended it would be absolutely impossible to discuss the Bill within the time suggested by the Prime Minister. They had the same experience two years ago on the Education Bill, the result being that that Act was unworkable and required amendment. He ventured to say there never was a greater exhibition of the impotence of Parliament to do its work than what was then going on. He had described to his children that the House of Commons was engaged in talking about what they should talk about. It only showed the absolute necessity, if Parliament was to regain control of its business, of having some means of ascertaining the general sense of the House. If there was necessity for closure by compartments there could be smaller compartments than those proposed by the Prime Minister. It was said that many Members of the Opposition were opposed to the main provisions of this Bill, but that was no legitimate reason why the Opposition should be closured. If that were legitimate it would be a reason for closuring all contentious Bills. If they were to pass good practical legislation they would have to find out the general feeling of the House, and, to do that Bills must be properly discussed. To have no better means of carrying on its business than the system of closuring proposed by the Government reflected upon the intelligence of the House of Commons.

* MR. TOMKINSON (Cheshire, Crewe) while admitting that it was the hope of the Opposition that this Bill might yet be defeated, absolutely denied that they were averse to any amendment of the measure. There were innumerable provisions which required the closest investigation, such for instance as the manner in which the compensation should be decided, and the procedure to be adopted when the whole of the licences were in the hands of one owner; and Amendments were necessary to make the Bill less objectionable. The absolute refusal of the Prime Minister to extend the allotted time justified the suspicion that there were causes for this Resolution which did not appear on the surface. The truth was that the Government were afraid of a full discussion of the Bill; they shrank from a thorough investigation of details, and the Opposition would fail in their duty if they did not make every possible protest against the manner in which the Bill had been brought forward, and the means by which it was being forced through against the manifest will of the country.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—
Mr. Herbert Gladstone and
Mr. William M'Arthur.

Question put accordingly.

As the House was being cleared for the division,

MR. CROOKS (Woolwich) seated, said; I do not want to seem unruly, Sir, or disobedient to the rules of the House. I feel that the best thing I can do is to ask you to suspend me from the service of the House. If I am to be closured in this manner without an opportunity of speaking, I think it would be better if it were done forthwith. I shall be rejoiced to be relieved of the responsibility of marching through the Lobby and doing nothing at all.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is asking me to do what I have no power to do. I cannot suspend him. It is for the House to suspend him if he does what I hope he will not do, and that is to show disrespect to the rules of the House. The hon. Member has made his protest openly, and no doubt notice will be taken of the fact; and if he goes through the Lobby he will make his protest in a legitimate and proper way.

Mr. CROOKS: I agree, Mr. Speaker, that is the proper way. But what can one do when we are closured down? I want to be respectful to you and to the House, but this is the only way in which one has a chance of bringing before the public the iniquitous act of the Government over this Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER: I hope the hon. Member will see that what he is doing is really not in the nature of a protest; it is merely acting obstructively to the House.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 :—

*Mr. HELME (Lancashire, Lancaster) said the word he asked the Committee to insert after the word unsuitable would make it perfectly clear in the future that the magistrates could exercise their discretion in the matter of the renewal of licences quite apart from the structure itself. Under the unusual circumstances in which the Committee at present found itself by the closure Motion just adopted he gathered that it was not the wish of the Government that he should occupy the time of the Committee by giving his reasons for moving this Amendment and he therefore asked the Committee to accept it on the ground that its meaning was manifest, and its object was good and it was of the very greatest practical importance. If the Government would not have discussion he would throw on them the responsibility of recording their votes to destroy the effective control of the justices if that was their desire. He begged to move.

Question proposed, "That the word 'otherwise' be there inserted."

Mr. H. C. RICHARDS (Finsbury, E.), who was continually interrupted by cries of "Divide," said the Committee was being treated with scant courtesy by his hon. friend who, speaking as a magistrate, had moved this Amendment without giving the House his reasons for so doing. He, as a lawyer, wanted to know what it was the hon. Member was asking the Committee to do. He thought the Committee had already settled this principle. There had been three days discussion upon it, and he thought it was quite clear that, while they had no intention of giving unsuitable tenants and tenants of unsuitable premises a fresh lease of life, there was no intention to inflict on the present licence-holders a new disqualification. If this Amendment was carried it would be extremely difficult for the various benches of magistrates to know what the alteration in the law was if the words "otherwise unsuitable" were put into the Bill. A bench of magistrates for any reason or lack of reason, for personal pique because they did not like the man, would be able to dispossess him without compensation. How unfair that would be after what had been said with regard to the ante-1869 licences that, although the houses were in most cases unsuitable, the holders of those licences should have compensation. If this Amendment were carried there was a chance of their losing their licences without compensation. The question had been raised as to the house being unsuitable because it was next to a chapel, church or school, but if that house was carrying on its business in accordance with the existing law it could not be said it was unsuitable because of its position in a neighbourhood which in all probability had grown up around it. Another thing they had to consider was that premises which might have been suitable fifty or sixty years ago might not in the altered circumstances of to-day be regarded as suitable, and it would be a monstrous thing if the old licences were taken away without any reason and without any compensation. He appealed to the Government not to accept the Amendment.

SIR ROBERT REID (Dumfries Burghs), in supporting the Amendment, said they were fighting this Bill, with a very strong feeling against it, under very exceptional conditions. All this Amendment meant was that the local justices were to keep in their own hands the discretion of renewals or non-renewals on the ground of structural deficiencies or of premises unsuitable otherwise, as the Bill stood the word "unsuitable" was governed by the word "structural." This should not be so, it ought to be unsuitability of any legal kind. Was it fair to attenuate the small space of time at their disposal either by the absence of Gentlemen who might be present or by speaking against time for the purpose of preventing other Amendments from being considered? He appealed to every right-minded man not to act in that way.

THE SOLICITOR-GENERAL (Sir EDWARD CARSON, Dublin University) did not think there was any occasion for the outburst of his hon. and learned friend. There had been only one speech from the Unionist side of the House, and he did not suppose his hon. and learned friend would go so far as to say that not a word was to be said from that side of the House. He did not know how he was to treat this as a serious Amendment when the hon Member who introduced it said he did not think it necessary to give any reasons in support of it. He could not accept the Amendment because by so doing he would take away the whole foundation of the argument with which he successfully resisted the Amendment to leave out the word "unsuitable," which the hon. and learned Member for Shrewsbury moved on a previous occasion. To put in this word "otherwise" would be to leave it open to the magistrates, through no default whatever on the part of the licence-holder, to confiscate the licence and the compensation for which he had subscribed. Suppose that a church or school were built near an old-established licensed house, and the magistrates came to the conclusion that, owing to such proximity, that was no longer a suitable place for the licensed house, what default was there on the part of the licence-holder? The truth was this Amendment, small as it might seem, would strike at the foundation of the Bill; for the whole principle upon which the Bill had been framed was that of allowing people to insure their premises if those premises were to be taken for the public benefit. It had been assumed that because a man got compensation, therefore he would be anxious to have his licence taken away. No such thing would follow at all. In many cases the compensation might not be anything like as much as was made out of the premises; and there was also an additional hold over a man who had a licence of this kind, for if he did not keep the premises in a condition of which the magistrates approved he might be put into one of the categories under the Bill which would deprive him of compensation altogether. Surely a man who knew that in order to get compensa- everything depended on the way in which he conducted the premises was far more likely to strive to carry out the wishes of the magistrates than a man who practically lost nothing when his premises were taken away. Under the circumstances they could not possibly accept the Amendment.

*MR. H. D. GREENE (Shrewsbury) said he was glad to hear that the Government did not intend to accept this Amendment. At the same time he thought there was abundant justification for the Amendment being moved. There was an ambiguity in the language of the Bill in respect to this matter which the Government ought to clear up. This Clause was framed to provide a very pretty law suit for the benefit, no doubt, of a very deserving class. It would be far better for the Solicitor-General to deal with the matter now. As to whether the word "structural" governed the word "unsuitable" the Solicitor-General interpreted the clause one way and another hon. Member on his side of the House interpreted it another. The same diversity of opinion existed on the other side. As it stood the question must be raised either on a case stated for the High Court or at quarter sessions. He held that the word structurally ought to be inserted.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Sir Alexander Acland-Hood and Mr. Ailwyn Fellowes.

MR. J. H. LEWIS (Flint Boroughs) moved an Amendment with the object of preserving the administrative discretion of the magistrates in order that they might continue to bring pressure to bear to prevent frequent changes of tenancy. The constant transfer of licences, particularly in the case of tied houses, constituted, he said, one of the scandals of the licensing system. It had been calculated that no fewer than 20,000 transfers were effected per annum. In Hertfordshire 423 houses changed hands more than three times during five years; in Hull there were nearly 400 transfers a year; in Lincoln the average tenancy of tied houses was two and a half years; in Leeds out of 379 tied houses there were 165 transfers in one year, and in Birmingham out of 2,300 licences there were 800 transfers per annum. In a large number of these cases tenant after tenant was ruined owing to the exorbitant terms imposed by the brewers, and it was desirable that the magistrates should be able to bring pressure to prevent these constant changes from taking place. He submitted that in these cases the words "ill-conducted" did not cover the ground.

Amendment proposed—

> "In page 1, line 7, after the word "unsuitable," to insert the words "or have been subject to frequent changes of tenancy.'"—(Mr. J. H. Lewis.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. AKERS-DOUGLAS (Kent, St. Augustine's) pointed out that if changes of tenancy were due to ill-conduct the magistrates already had power to take away the licence without compensation. But if the changes were due to mortality, illness, or any other circumstances, then, if the licence was taken away, compensation ought to follow. There might be evils connected with constant changes of tenancy, but, on the other hand, anything that tended to prevent a brewer from sending away a bad tenant ought not to be encouraged. The Government could not accept the Amendment.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Sir Alexander Acland-Hood and Mr. Ailwyn Fellowes.

MR. HERBERT ROBERTS (Denbighshire, W.) moved a drafting Amendment to make it perfectly clear that one ground with regard to unfitness would be sufficient to enable the magistrates or local justices to exercise their full discretion.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 1, line 7, after the third word 'or' to insert the words 'on any ground or.'"—(Mr. Herbert Roberts.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*MR. AKERS DOUGLAS said there was no necessity for the Amendment, because according to Section 1 of the Interpretation Act, 1889, the singular included the plural, and the plural the singular.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. HERBERT ROBERTS moved an Amendment to the first sub-section giving power to the justices of the licensing district, in considering the question of the renewal of any licence, to take into account not only the character or fitness of the incoming tenant, or proposed holder of the licence, but the character or fitness of the outgoing tenant. The discretion of the justices in such a case was, as the Bill stood, limited to the point whether or not the premises had been "ill-conducted." He thought his point might best be put by stating an imaginary concrete case. Supposing the outgoing tenant was either a poacher himself in a country district or was known to have received poachers upon his licensed premises. It might be held in considering the renewal of the licence in such a case that the local justices had no right to consider the question of the fitness of the character of the outgoing licensee. As the section was drawn at present it was doubtful whether the local justices could exercise a full discretion in reference to that case. With regard to the Amendment referring to reasonable refreshment, he acknowledged that the section withdrew a certain power of pressure under this Bill. It was in order to safeguard the full discretion of the local justices that he moved this Amendment. The hon. Member opposite had said that there was so much vagueness in this Bill that it was impossible to tell what it meant, and that state of things made it all the more necessary with regard to the renewal of licences that every care should be taken to make it perfectly clear that the justices had precisely the same powers of discretion as they had now. The Solicitor-General said there had been many fallacies as to the effect of this clause upon the discretion of the local justices. He did not suppose that anybody would contend that this section would give to the justices any discretionary power with regard to the conduct and character of the outgoing tenants. It was of the utmost importance that it should be made plain that the local justices retained their full powers of discretion, and he begged to move his Amendment.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 1, line 8, after the word 'character,' to insert the words 'or conduct of the actual holder of the licence.'"—(Mr. Herbert Roberts.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS said the hon. Member was dealing with the case of the outgoing tenant, but what they were more deeply interested in was the incoming tenant, because, so far as the outgoing tenant was concerned, his case could be dealt with under the words in the Bill as to the ill-conduct of the premises. If this Amendment were accepted he was afraid it would put it into the power of a tenant wilfully to misbehave himself in order that those interested in the licensed premises should not be able to obtain compensation. The conduct of the outgoing tenant was so far as necessary dealt with by the earlier words of the clause, and they could not accept the Amendment.

MR. BROADHURST (Leicester) said the objection of the Home Secretary was an imaginary one, and was, to say the least of it, far-fetched. This Amendment dealt with the class of tenants engaged at very short notice to quit, and they would have very little opportunity of entering into a conspiracy to damage the property of the brewers by doing something to injure the house in order to prevent full compensation being given. His experience was, that if [they had a bad tenant with a bad record he was generally succeeded by a person with a similar character, because the house got a bad name, and no man with money to lose could be found to become the tenant of a house with a reputation of this kind. His hon. friend's Amendment dealt with a very important point, and one which was well worthy of the consideration of the Committee, and well worth inserting in the Bill. He remembered one case in which a tenant came before the court with a pile of recommendations, nearly all from clergymen in the Church of England, and they appalled the court, and they had to accept the applicant. The man had been recently accused of horse-stealing, and he suspected something of the kind when he saw such a long list of recommendations from members of the Church of England. [MINISTERIAL cries of "Oh."] He was saying this without prejudice. The ministers in his Church and Free Churches generally did not write characters for men going as tenants into public-houses. In this particular case the result was that for three or four succeeding tenancies no one conducted that house upon satisfactory principles. One man who attempted to carry on the business in a highly respectable manner became bankrupt, and was kicked out by the brewers after a very few days notice. He thought this Amendment was one which would commend itself to all hon. Members who had had any lengthy experience at brewster sessions, examining into the character of the men who came into those houses, and who often went out of them hastily. It was an Amendment of considerable importance, and could not be disposed of by the reasons given by the Home Secretary.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Sir Alexander Acland-Hood and Mr. Ailwyn Fellowes.

MR. LAWRENCE (Liverpool, Abercromby) said he desired to move the Amendment standing in his name on the Paper. The point he wished to raise was whether this clause did or did not limit the discretion of the magistrates. He held the opinion that under the words "ill-conducted" the discretion of the magistrates was unduly limited. He therefore suggested that after the word "character" the words "conduct of his business by" should be inserted. The question was whether the word "ill-conducted" modified the power of the magistrate in seeing that a business was properly carried on. The best way would be to show by concrete instances how the discretion of the magistrates hitherto had operated. In Liverpool, under the present system, they had put down the long pull, and forbidden the offering of sweets to children who were sent to public-houses. Neither of those things could be described as ill-conduct, and they were no more illegitimate than the conduct of shipping companies in carrying people across the Atlantic below cost price. He wished to know, if this Bill was passed, how the magistrates would stand with regard to customs which, although they were undesirable in themselves, were not strictly illegitimate. He had suggested these words because he thought it would enlarge the powers of the Bill, and leave the magistrates somewhat freer. He quite recognised that the magistrates had not always shown the proper discretion, and that they had now and then tried to impose limitations which were to be deprecated. In some cases they had almost attempted to legislate instead of merely administering the law. He begged to move.

"In page 1, line 8, after the word 'character,' to insert the words 'conduct of his business by.'"—(Mr. Lawrence.)

Question proposed "That those words be there inserted."

SIR EDWARD CARSON said the Government could not possibly accept the Amendment. It referred not merely to the particular business with which the magistrates were dealing, but to any business in which the applicant was previously concerned. Anything that was to be gained by the Amendment was already provided for in the Bill. If the Amendment referred only to the fitness of a person to hold a licence that was already in the Bill. He ventured to say that the interests of the public were sufficiently protected by the clause as it now stood. On the other hand, if the proposed words were inserted they might leave it open to an extreme bench of justices to judge a man, not on his own merits, or in relation to the premises in which he actually conducted the business, but in relation to something else.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Sir Alexander Acland-Hood and Mr. Ailwyn Fellowes.

MR. HERBERT ROBERTS had given notice of an Amendment to insert in Clause 1, line 8, after "fitness" the words "or status as regards the licensed premises."

*THE CHAIRMAN: I believe this Amendment really raises the same question as the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for West Denbighshire and recently discussed.

*THE CHAIRMAN: I suppose that means bona fide tenancy.

MR. HERBERT ROBERTS: The object of the Amendment is to ensure that the local justices shall have under this section the same rights which they now enjoy under Section 16, Sub-section 1, of the Licensing Act, 1902, to ask for the perusal of agreements between a brewery company and a landlord.

*THE CHAIRMAN: The object is to see whether a man is a bona fide tenant or not. [Opposition cries of "No."] I do not know what the object is unless it is to find out whether it is a bona fide tenancy.

Mr. HERBERT ROBERTS: It is to see under what conditions he carries on the tenancy.

The CHAIRMAN: Surely the conditions of the tenancy are to show whether the tenancy is bona fide. [Opposition cries of "No."] What else does it show? I think it really raises the same point.

Mr. HERBERT ROBERTS: May I move the Amendment in order to ask a question of the Government, namely, whether this clause will enable the justices to ask for the perusal of any agreement there is between the landlord or a brewery company and the licence-holder? It is a question of great administrative importance, as I know from long experience on the Bench.

The CHAIRMAN: I really cannot see that this raises any question except that of the bona fides of the tenant. The fact that the licence-holder has some agreement of the kind indicated by the hon. Member would only make the premises come under the name of a tied house. [Opposition cries of "No."] Well, I cannot conceive any other, and the hon. Member has not suggested any other.

Mr. HERBERT ROBERTS: I will suggest it at once. It is a question of the length of the tenancy.

The CHAIRMAN: The point the hon. Member has mentioned has already been discussed. We have had Amendments dealing with the length of the tenancy.

Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE: Supposing there is a condition in connection with the tenancy which affects the proportion of the contribution, that has nothing to do with a tied house at all. It may be between an ordinary landlord and an ordinary tenant. That has nothing whatever to do with the length of the tenancy or with the purchasing of goods from certain people. The only point which my hon. friend wishes to raise is whether the magistrates shall have the right to see the agreement and consider these points before they arrive at a decision. We have not discussed the point at all.

Mr. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): Supposing the agreement contracts the tenant out of the rights to be conferred on him by this Bill, what would be the position of the tenant?

The CHAIRMAN: Then he is not a bona fide tenant. That is a question which has already been discussed.

Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE: I beg your pardon.

The CHAIRMAN: If the hon. Member will bring forward an Amendment raising the specific point he has put, I will consider it, but the word "status" covers bona fides, and it covers the position of a tenant as regards a tied house. Both of these points have already been discussed.

*MR. EMMOTT said there was a recent case in which the licence-holder gave a power of attorney to a brewery company. It was most important that the magistrates should have power to get information in cases of that kind. It worked out in this way. At any moment the brewery company could step in and use the power of attorney and turn the man out without compensation of any kind.

*THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman may move the Amendment if he will undertake not to raise the tied house question. I do not know whether the word "status" is known to English law. It is a Latin word which may cover a good deal.

MR. ASQUITH (Fifeshire, E.): I would suggest to my hon. friend that instead of the words in the Amendment he should move the insertion of the words "or contracted rights or liabilities as regards the licensed premises."

MR. HERBERT ROBERTS said he would move the Amendment in the way suggested by the right hon. Gentleman. His only wish was to obtain the view of the Government as to whether under this section local justices would have the same power of examining documents as they now possessed.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 1, line 8, after the word 'fitness,' to insert the words 'or contracted rights or liabilities as regards the licensed premises.'"—(Mr. Herbert Roberts.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR EDWARD CARSON said the mover of the Amendment had asked whether under this clause the magistrates would continue to have the powers which were vested in them by the Licensing Act of 1892 as to calling for certain documents. There was nothing in this Bill to take away these powers from the local licensing justices. It was quite plain that the procedure before the local licensing justices would be exactly the same as at present.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: Can they refuse the licence if they consider the conditions unfair?

SIR EDWARD CARSON: They have the same power of calling on parties to produce agreements.

SIR ROBERT REID said the magistrates might call for the production of documents, but when they had got them, they could do nothing. The virtue of the Amendment was that it enabled them not merely to call for the documents, but, if they were unsatisfactory, to act on the documents by refusing the renewal of the licence if necessary. It was perfectly idle for the Solicitor-General to say that if the words of the Amendment were not inserted the powers of the justices would be the same as at present.

and Mr. Ailwyn Fellowes.

MR. WHITLEY said he wished to move the omission of the word "proposed," so as to keep within the purview of the magistrates not only the character or fitness of the "proposed holder of the licence," but the continued methods in which the particular house had been conducted. If the word "proposed" were retained in the clause, it appeared to him that it would be possible for any offence against the licensing laws to be absolutely wiped out by bringing forward a new tenant. As a matter of fact that was a practice not unknown in some districts. Some owners of licensed premises were so keen to get a maximum of profits that they had a system of bringing in a succession of licence-holders, and winking at malpractices of the tenant until he was dropped upon by the police. He could not think that it was the object of the Government to encourage a practice of that kind, but unless the word "proposed" was left out, the magistrates would have no control whatever over the licence-holder.

SIR EDWARD CARSON said that the Amendment would make the Bill utterly unworkable. It would compel the magistrates to inquire, not into the character or fitness of the man who was going to carry on the business but of the man who had been put out, probably because he did not carry it on properly. He hoped the House would not agree to the Amendment.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Mr. J. H. Whitley and Mr. Trevelyan.

"In page 1, line 9, after the word 'licence' to insert the words 'on the ground that the renewal would be void.'"—(Sir Edward Carson.)

Amendment agreed to.

MR. HERBERT ROBERTS said he wished to move an Amendment further adding the words "or that any conditions upon which the licence was granted have not been fulfilled." He said this was an important matter, and went to the root of the question of good conduct. If it were not made perfectly clear in this section that the justices had the right to consider this vital point when they were asked to renew a licence, a serious weakening of their discretion would take place.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 1, line 9, after the word 'licence,' to insert the words 'or that any conditions upon which the licence was granted have not been fulfilled.'"—(Mr. Herbert Roberts).

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR EDWARD CARSON said that, as far as the form of the Amendment was concerned, the Government could not accept it. As regarded the substance, there was a good deal to be said for it. Where a person had given an undertaking of any importance to a licensing bench in the past as a condition of obtaining his licence, and broke that undertaking, he ought not to have any compensation. He did not think anybody could dispute that proposition. His opinion was that any man who had given such an undertaking, and broken it, was guilty of misconduct in the carrying on of the business. He did not say that because he did not want to make the matter perfectly right in the Bill, but he was afraid that if in this place it were laid down that there was to be no compensation in the event of a breach of undertaking, it would be argued afterwards on the construction of the section that the words "ill-conducted" were not as wide as at first sight they seemed to be. He really thought that to put in the words proposed would be to weaken the significance of the term "ill-conducted."

SIR ROBERT REID said he understood that they were agreed as regarded the principle. That was a matter for satisfaction. The Solicitor-General appeared to be afraid of the familiar rule in law that the specification of particular instances would weaken the effect of general words. He did not agree. For instance, the opening of a bar where an undertaking was given that it would not be opened would be extremely bad conduct; but would it mean that the premises were ill-conducted? He would suggest that the Amendment be accepted now, subject to further consideration on Report.

SIR EDWARD CARSON said he had the greatest possible regard for the opinion of the hon. and learned Gentleman; but he could not accept the words of the particular Amendment. He would, however, undertake to bring up words which would carry out the object to the fullest extent. He himself would prefer the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Sheffield.

MR. MOULTON (Cornwall, Launceston) said he thought the Amendment of the hon. Member for Sheffield would not meet the case. There were public-houses in the neighbourhood of the London markets that opened at very early hours. Such opening might be a breach of an undertaking; but would it mean that the house was ill-conducted?

MR. HERBERT ROBERTS said he would accept the suggestion of the Solicitor-General and withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR JAMES WOODHOUSE (Huddersfield) moved to insert words excepting county boroughs from the scope of the clause, in order to call attention to the anomalous jurisdiction of county boroughs under this section. There was no doubt a great anomaly was created by the section. Whilst the full body of justices were to be competent under this Bill to deal with the question of structural fitness of the building, the conduct of the applicant, his fitness, and so forth, they would not be competent to deal with the question whether the house was required or not. Then there already existed a statutory committee, so that there would be under the Bill a full body of justices and a new statutory committee and the existing licensing committee of seven members. The licensing justices would not view that with any satisfaction at all. If there were to be an alteration it ought to be in the direction of giving the committee in the first instance the consideration of the matter, and afterwards refer it to the full body of the justices. He hoped the Solicitor-General would give him an assurance that the anomalies which undoubtedly the section created would be removed.

Amendment proposed—

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR EDWARD CARSON said the Amendment was in the wrong place. Its proper place was in Clause 7. There was, however, a great deal in what the hon. Baronet had said, that there should be an appeal to the whole body of the magistrates; and he would undertake to have the matter considered, and some Amendment put down to meet his wishes.

MR. AUSTIN TAYLOR (Liverpool, East Toxteth) asked if that would mean retaining the Recorder as chairman.

SIR EDWARD CARSON said it was intended to move an Amendment to omit the Recorder as chairman.

MR. SCOTT-MONTAGU (Hampshire, New Forest): To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he can now give the number of accidents caused by motor-cars and by horses and horse-drawn vehicles in the year ended 31st May last.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Akers-Douglas.) The figures for the Metropolitan Police District are given in the table below. It is to be noted that in the absence of information as to the total numbers of horses or of the various kinds of vehicles in use, there is no basis for a comparison between the figures. It is not practicable to give similar figures for the rest of the country outside the Metropolitan Police District.

Hyde Park Corner—Slippery Wood Pavement.

Mr. H. C. RICHARDS (Finsbury, E.): To ask the hon. Member for Chorley, as representing the First Commissioner of Works, whether he will give directions that gravel or sand be placed upon the slippery wood pavement extending from the gateway of Constitution Hill across to the entrance of Hyde Park; and whether he is aware that up till 10 a.m. no such protection is given for drivers or riders crossing the wood pavement.

(Answered by Lord Balcarres.) The Westminster City Council are responsible for this road, and it would rest with them to provide gravel or sand as suggested.

Disposal of Bronze Lions from British Museum.

Mr. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): To ask the hon. Member for Chorley, as representing the First Commissioner of Works, if he will state what has become of a number of bronze lions which were along the line of railings in front of the British Museum, and which were removed to widen the footway.

Disposal of Colonnade from Burlington House.

Mr. SWIFT MACNEILL: To ask the hon. Member for Chorley, as representing the First Commissioner of Works, if he will state what has become of the handsome stone colonnade (classical pillars, monoliths) formerly in front of Burlington House, Piccadilly, and removed by the Department of Works, and say why it is not re-erected in one of the Parks or elsewhere.

(Answered by Lord Balcarres.) The colonnade is lying in Battersea Park; the question of re-erecting it is now under the consideration of the First Commissioner.

Outdoor Medical Relief in the Metropolis.

Sir WALTER FOSTER (Derbyshire, Ilkeston): To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he will take steps to have a report made by the inspector now investigating the arrangements for outdoor medical relief in the Metropolis on the number of unions, if any, in which medical relief is granted on loan in the first instance, and on the practice of requiring applicants for medical relief to attend before the Board or a committee, with a statement of how long such practice has been in force and its effects on the number of applications.

(Answered by Mr. Walter Long.) I will take steps to give effect to this suggestion as far as may be practicable.

Adulteration of Food—Recommendations of Royal Commission.

Sir CUTHBERT QUILTER (Suffolk, Sudbury): To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether, in pursuance of their powers, the Board propose to take action on the lines recommended by the Royal Commission on Arsenical Poisoning in Part VIIIa. of their Report, by the appointment of a special expert officer, or otherwise. for securing better control over the purity of chemically prepared, preserved, or other foods liable to contain deleterious substances; and whether progress has been made in giving effect to the further recommendation of the Royal Commission, that the principle of officially prescribed food standards already enforced in the case of certain articles of diet should be applied to other foods and beverages.

(Answered by Mr. Walter Long.) I have not at present decided to appoint a special expert officer of the kind referred to. The consideration of the recommendations of the Royal Commission is being proceeded with, and in connection with it the proposal with regard to the appointment of such an officer will receive attention. Effect, however, could not be given to the recommendations as to food standards without legislation.

Report of Boiler Committee.

Sir CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean): To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty when the Final Report of the Boiler Committee will be in the hands of Members; and whether he can give the House any statement as to the coal consumption in the case of Belleville boilers as compared with that in the case of Babcock boilers or Yarrow boilers.

(Answered by Mr. Pretyman.) The Final Report of the Boiler Committee was received on the 2nd instant, and is now under consideration. It is hoped that it will shortly be in the hands of Members. The coal used per H.P. per hour on the trials conducted by the Boiler Committee was as follows:—

Babcock and Wilcox	1·8 lbs. to 2·1 lbs.
Belleville - -	1·8 lbs. to 2·1 lbs.
Yarrow large tube -	1·9 lbs. to 2·2 lbs.

By-laws under the Employment of Children Act.

MR TENNANT (Berwickshire): To ask the Secretary for Scotland how many sets of by-laws under the Employment of Children Act, 1903, have been sent to him for confirmation; what local authorities have sent these by-laws, and in how many, and what, cases the sanction of his Department has been given.

(Answered by Mr. A. Graham Murray.) Proposed by-laws have been received from the town councils of Ayr and Glasgow, the county council of Dumfries, and the school boards of Greenock, Ayr, Glasgow, Stirling, Paisley, Perth, Annan, Govan Parish, Gourock, Leith, Peebles, Crieff, Blantyre Parish, Ardrossan. The proposed by-laws have been or are being locally advertised, and are now under consideration in connection with objections submitted in the respective cases. No by-laws have as yet been sanctioned.

New Scheme for Whitstable Charities.

MR. SLACK (Hertfordshire, St. Albans): To ask the hon. Member for Tonbridge, as Parliamentary Charity Commissioner, whether, before sanctioning and sealing the new scheme for the Whitstable Charities, he will so amend it that the endowment originally provided for the payment of teachers' salaries shall continue to be paid to the local education authority as provided by Section 13 of The Education Act, 1902.

(Answered by Mr. Griffith Boscawen.) The Commissioners do not understand that any payment has been made to the local education authority from this Charity; and whether any such payment ought under any circumstances to be made is a matter not for the Commissioners, but for the Board of Education. In the circumstances the Commissioners have nothing to add to their Answer of 1st July.†

Mr. J. Robinson's Farm at Ballinacross.

MR. J. P. FARRELL (Longford, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether any application has been made to the Estates Commissioners to purchase the farm of Ballinacross from Mr. John Robinson, Sub-Sheriff of county Longford, who is willing to sell same for the benefit of the representatives of the evicted tenants, and with a view to their restoration thereto.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) No application has been made to the Commissioners for the sale of this farm.

Sale of the O'Brien Estate.

MR. J. P. FARRELL: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland to state the present position of the negotiations for the sale of the O'Brien Estate at Corglass and Cornakelly; and whether, in view of the delay in completing this sale, the Estates Commissioners will apply to Judge Ross for a request to issue under the 7th Section of the Act of 1903.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) I am informed by the registrar of the Land Judge's Court that the notice in Form 10 prescribed by the rules of 10th January, 1902, is about to be served. The solicitor having carriage of the sale is also acting for the tenants, and this would seem to afford a guarantee that no unnecessary delay will take place in bringing about a sale. The case will not be lost sight of by the Land Judge.

Promotion of Sergeant Ryan—Royal Irish Constabulary.

MR. SLOAN (Belfast, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that

Sergeant Ryan, of the Royal Irish Constabulary, in Belfast, was some time ago found in an ill-conducted house; if so, will he state whether his conduct on this occasion was reported to his superior officer and what punishment, if any, was inflicted; and will he explain on what grounds has Ryan been promoted to the rank of head constable.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) The incident referred to in the first part of the Question occurred in January, 1896. Sergeant Ryan did not deny that he had entered the house, but stated he had done so with the object of endeavouring to trace stolen property. He was reported to be an excellent officer, and as there was no evidence to show that he entered the house for any purpose other than that stated by him, the Inspector-General considered that the necessities of the case would be sufficiently met by a caution against entering such a house in future. In July, 1900, he was permitted, on the recommendation of his officers, to compete for promotion to the rank of head constable. He was successful, and was promoted in October, 1900.

Belfast Police—Alleged Preference given to Roman Catholics.

Mr. SLOAN: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he can state why all the appointments made at Henry Street Police Barracks, Belfast, during the year 1902, and carrying with them extra pay, were given to Roman Catholics; and can he state the number of men stationed at this barrack, how many are Roman Catholics and how many are Protestants, including the district inspector who is in charge.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) Two such appointments were made in the year 1902. Both men are Roman Catholics, but the appointments were not determined by considerations of religion. In one case the extra pay amounts to a shilling weekly, and the recipient lost a night-watch allowance of similar amount. There are fifty-two men at Henry Street Barrack, twenty-eight are Roman Catholics, and twenty-four Protestants. The district inspector is a Roman Catholic.

Decorations at Roundstone—Action of Police.

Mr. SLOAN: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that flags and banners were some time ago hung out of all the public-houses in Roundstone, county Galway; that the Reverend Father Gleeson sent a written complaint to Sir Antony M'Donnell against Sergeant Ryan and Constable Laidley for explaining to certain publicans that it was illegal to hang flags from their licensed premises; and that the sergeant was severely reprimanded and the constable transferred because of performing this duty; and, if so, will he say whether an opportunity was given to Ryan and Laidley to refute the charges contained in Father Gleeson's letter; if not, will he lay a copy of the letter upon the Table.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) The replies to the first two queries are in the affirmative. On inquiry it transpired that only one publican was informed that a display of flags was illegal. The occasion on which these emblems were displayed was the eve of the visit to Roundstone of the newly-appointed Archbishop of Tuam, the first visit after his appointment. The flags exhibited were not Party emblems of the character contemplated by the statute 6 and 7 Will. 4, cap. 38, sec. 9, and as it appeared that the constable had acted without reference to the district inspector or head constable, the Inspector-General considered that his interference was improper, and he so informed him. The sergeant was exonerated from blame. Constable Laidley's transfer had no connection with this incident. The Inspector-General considered he had shown distinct sectarian feeling while stationed at Roundstone, and the county inspector was of opinion that, in the interests of the public service, it was necessary to transfer him to another station. Explanations were furnished by both the sergeant and constable in respect of the matters alleged against them by the Reverend Mr. Gleeson.

Cost of Conveying Militia Artillery from the North to Portsmouth.

Sir JOHN COLOMB (Great Yarmouth): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether he can state approximately the estimated cost of conveyance to and from Portsmouth of the Militia Artillery Corps from Lancashire, Durham, Northumberland, and various parts of Scotland for the purpose of mobilisation under the existing arrangements.

Northumberland Royal Garrison Artillery (Militia) . . .	1,150
Lancashire Royal Garrison Artillery (Militia) . . .	400
The Duke of Edinburgh's Royal Garrison Artillery (Militia) .	1,650
Fife Royal Garrison Artillery (Militia)	1,000
Forfar and Kincardine Royal Garrison Artillery (Militia) .	1,250
Durham Royal Garrison Artillery (Militia)	1,150
The South-East of Scotland Royal Garrison Artillery (Militia)	1,000
	£7,600

North of England Militia Artillery Training.

Sir JOHN COLOMB: To ask the Secretary of State for War whether the Militia Artillery Corps, forming part of the war garrison of Portsmouth but belonging to Lancashire, Durham, Northumberland, and various parts of Scotland, have at their own local headquarters the means of training at guns and artillery appliances exactly corresponding to those they have to serve when mobilised at Portsmouth.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Arnold-Forster.) Units of Militia Garrison Artillery are trained every third year at least at the fortresses to which they are allotted for mobilisation, and during other years at a work of defence armed with a modern armament. The cost of providing at the local headquarters appliances exactly corresponding to those the corps have to serve in a modern fortress, such as Portsmouth, would be prohibitive.

Attendance of a Deputy Judge-Advocate at Courts-Martial in India.

Mr. H. D. GREENE (Shrewsbury): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether any regulation has been recently adopted as to dispensing with or otherwise altering the attendance at Courts-Martial in India of a Deputy Judge-Advocate, and on what grounds, and whether such change was approved by the Government before it was made; and, if so, whether the presence of an independent official possessing special legal knowledge is no longer considered requisite to safeguard the interests of accused soldiers at Courts-Martial.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Brodrick.) No report on the subject has been received from the Government of India. I will make inquiries.

Mr. MOON (St. Pancras, N.): To ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies why the services of those who were detailed for naval service in Canada against the Fenians in 1868 have not been recognised by the reward of a medal.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Lyttelton.) Medals were granted to those who were engaged in repelling the Fenian raids of 1866 and 1870, and in the Red River Expedition of 1870, but it was not considered desirable to grant the medal to men who served in the defence of the Dominion along the frontier in other years about that period, since their services practically amounted to policing the frontier, and they were not engaged in actual military operations.

Import Duty on Magazines in Australia.

Mr. RUNCIMAN (Dewsbury): To ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether his attention has been called to the announcement made by the Australian Commonwealth Government that from 19th August next all magazines and periodicals containing more than 15 per cent. of advertising matter will be liable to an import duty of 3d. per lb.; whether he is aware that the effect of this duty will be to exclude from a British Colony a number of British magazines and periodicals; and what steps he proposes to take in the matter.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Lyttelton.) I have not yet seen the notification of the Australian Government to which the hon. Member refers, but I will inquire whether such a notification has been issued and will draw the attention of the Commonwealth Government to the probable effect of the proposal to which the hon. Member refers. The matter, however, must be left to the discretion of that Government to take what action they think fit.

QUESTIONS IN THE HOUSE.

Admiralty Contractors and the Fair Wages Resolution—Case of Messrs. Lysaght, of Bristol.

Mr. CHARLES HOBHOUSE (Bristol, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether Messrs. Lysaght, of Bristol, are contractors for the Admiralty; and, if so, whether it has been brought to his notice that Messrs. Lysaght are discharging men from their employment on account of their membership of a trade union, in contravention of the Fair Wages Resolution of the House of Commons, which has been adopted by all Government Departments; and, if so, what steps he proposes to take in the matter.

The SECRETARY to the ADMIRALTY (Mr. Pretyman, Suffolk, Woodbridge): The Answer to the first part of the hon. Member's Question is in the affirmative, and to the second part in the negative. The Fair Wages Resolution of the House of Commons does not appear to lay down any guidance for dealing with cases of this character, unless it can be shown that the firm are paying less than the current rate of wages.

Mr. CHARLES HOBHOUSE: Does the Secretary to the Admiralty intend the House to understand that the question of the preferential employment of non-unionists as against unionists is not raised by the Resolution?

Mr. PRETYMAN: I do not think there is anything regarding that in the Fair Wages Resolution.

*Sir CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean): Will the hon. Member acquaint himself with the circulars issued by the Treasury on the subject?

Machine Guns in the Regular Army.

Captain NORTON (Newington, W.): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office if he will state the number of Maxims, Nordenfelt, and Gardner machine guns, respectively, in use in the Regular Army; the number required to complete the armament; the number of each ordered for the present financial year, and where the orders have been placed; and also the cost of manufacture at Enfield Small Arms Factory, and the price paid to private firms for each class of gun.

*The FINANCIAL SECRETARY to the WAR OFFICE (Mr. Bromley Davenport, Cheshire, Macclesfield): There are in use in the Regular Army 990 Maxims, 33 Nordenfelts and 90 Gardner machine guns and a reserve of 25 per cent is held. The number of guns required to complete the armament is 110 Maxim guns; 81 are available for issue in store and 80 are still due on last year's orders. 100 Maxim guns have been ordered this year, one-half being placed with the Ordnance Factories and one-half with Messrs. Vickers, Maxim and Company. The only private firm manufacturing Maxim guns is Vickers, Maxim and Company, whose invention the gun is, and when arrangements were made with them for manufacture by them and the Ordnance Factories an undertaking was given not to divulge the price paid.

War Office Contracts—Messrs. Lysaght and the Fair Wages Resolution.

Mr. CHARLES HOBHOUSE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether Messrs. Lysaght, of Bristol, are contractors for the War Office; and, if so, whether it has been brought to his notice that Messrs. Lysaght are discharging men from their employment on account of their membership of a trade union, in contravention of the Fair Wages Resolution of the House of Commons, which has been adopted by all Government Departments; and, if so, what steps he proposes to take in the matter.

Member's Question, as to which I have no knowledge, do not indicate any contravention of the Fair Wages Resolution, which obliges this firm, and any firm employed under a Government contract, to pay the rate of wages generally accepted as current for similar work in the same district.

MR. CHARLES HOBHOUSE: Is it a fact that Messrs. Lysaght are doing work for the War Office, and, if so, will the War Office not consider themselves bound to interfere in a case where preference is shown to non-unionists as against unionists.

MR. BROMLEY DAVENPORT: We do employ Messrs. Lysaght, but under the Fair Wages Resolution there is no obligation on us to compel them to employ any particular persons, unionist or non-unionist.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE: The hon. Gentleman has said that even if the facts are as set forth, the War Office would have no right to interfere.

MR. BROMLEY DAVENPORT: No, I did not say that.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE: Will the hon. Gentleman acquaint himself with the evidence taken before the Fair Wages Committee, and the debates in which a positive pledge was given on this subject?

MR. BROMLEY DAVENPORT: I will.

MR. BROADHURST (Leicester): Will the hon. Gentleman also make himself acquainted with the facts as to whether men are being discharged or not.

MR. BROMLEY DAVENPORT: I will make inquiries, but in any case I am not clear that we have any power.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): Is it not the case that in August, 1893, the then Secretary of the Treasury and myself, speaking on behalf of the Government——

*MR. SPEAKER: That is a Question of which, I think, notice should be given.

Retired Volunteers.

MR. CHARLES ALLEN (Gloucestershire, Stroud): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether there is any available record of the number of retired Volunteers under thirty years of age who, during their term of service, were efficient for not less than three years.

MR. BROMLEY DAVENPORT: The Answer is in the negative.

Expenditure on Rifle Ranges.

MR. TILLETT (Norwich): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he will say how much of the £40,000 set aside in 1899 for rifle ranges has been actually appropriated; where such new ranges have been constructed; and whether they are open or screened.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. ARNOLD-FORSTER, Belfast, N.): The £40,000 originally allotted from the Military Works Loan, 1899, for Volunteer ranges was subsequently increased to £170,000. It has been all appropriated as shown in the Return which I have the pleasure of handing to the hon. Member. The money has been utilised in assisting Volunteers in providing range accommodation suitable for the ·303 rifle, either by extending or improving existing ranges or constructing new ones. The ranges for which grants have been made are all open ranges except five, viz., Oxford, Lincoln, Norton (Stockton-on-Tees), Kirkland (Fife), and Clifton, which are screened.

South African Constabulary.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the force suggested by the Government for the new South African Constabulary in 1901 was 10,000 men, whether he can say when the intention was formed that the force should consist of only 6,000, and when the strength was reduced to 5,000; whether he can state up to what date he possesses the Return of actual strength, and if he can give the figure of the actual strength at the date of the last Return; what was the original estimate of cost for 10,000 constabulary; and what is the expenditure contributed by the Transvaal towards the South African Constabulary in the present year.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. LYTTELTON, Warwick and Leamington): It was decided to constitute such a force towards the end of 1900. Lord Roberts considered that the force should be 10,000, as the extra number would obviate the need of more Regular troops for the work then required, but from the beginning Lord Milner maintained that 6,000 would be sufficient for police purposes when the war was over, and that fewer would be required after a time. The force was reduced to 5,000 in the course of the present April. The last Return of strength is dated 1st June and gives the actual strength as 4,770. The original estimate was £250 per man, or a total cost of £2,500,000 per annum. The cost of the constabulary is provided in the Inter-colonial Budget and not directly on the Transvaal Estimates. Towards the deficit on the Inter-colonial Budget for the year ended 30th June the Transvaal is contributing a sum of £767,000. In general explanation, I would refer the right hon. Member to pages 30 and 51 of Blue-book, Cd. 2102.

Sunday Labour in Transvaal Mines.

MR. SLACK (Hertfordshire, St. Albans): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, in view of the fact that one of the conditions of the agreement under which Chinese labourers are being introduced into the Transvaal provides that Sunday labour shall be optional, and to the fact that a conference has been summoned by the Johannesburg Free Church Council (which defended the introduction of Chinese labour) to protest against this condition, he proposes to take any, and, if so, what action in the matter.

MR. LYTTELTON: The contract provides that Sundays shall be holidays and that labourers are not bound to work on that day. Under the Sunday Labour Law, no ordinary mining work is done on Sundays, as I have been informed, but only work which is absolutely necessary, such as pumping, repairs, etc. I have not had the conference referred to brought to my notice, but I will make inquiry on the subject.

MR. MARKHAM (Nottinghamshire, Mansfield): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the stamps, etc., are running every day and that the mining goes on on Sundays just the same as on ordinary days?

MR LOUGH (Islington, W.): Why is it necessary to do repairs and pumping on Sundays?

MR. WHITLEY (Halifax): Are not these labourers paid on the basis of thirty days per month?

MR. LYTTELTON: Of thirty working days per month.

Boer Repatriation—Expenditure.

MR. BRYN ROBERTS (Carnarvonshire, Eifion): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he has now ascertained from Lord Milner whether he is willing to furnish a detailed statement of the moneys expended in repatriation of the Boers after the war, and in compensation for losses sustained by them in or in consequence of the war, and stating the name and address of every person who received £100 or upwards of such moneys, and on what account the same was received.

MR. LYTTELTON: I have referred the hon. Member's request to Lord Milner, and he informs me that the suggested limitation of the Return to recipients of £100 and upwards would not materially affect the reasons for which I stated that such a Return could not conveniently be prepared, as involving an unjustifiable expenditure of time and money.

MR. BRYN ROBERTS: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that there is considerable anxiety in South Africa as to whether the money has been properly expended, and is it not desirable to allay that feeling whatever the expense?

MR. LYTTELTON was understood to reply that wherever there was money to be distributed there was always anxiety.

MR. MARKHAM: Will the right hon. Gentleman give a Return showing the names of the persons whose farms were sold during the time of the war while they were fighting for their country.

Repatriation Loan.

MR. BUCHANAN (Perthshire, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies how much of the £5,800,000 spent out of the Guaranteed Loan for repatriation purposes under Head III. was spent on cost of administration.

MR. LYTTELTON: I am not able to state the amount spent on administration until I receive Lord Milner's final report. I would refer the hon. Member to Sir Arthur Lawley's observations on the point at page 64 of Cd. 1895.

The Somali Mullah.

MR. LAMBERT (Devonshire, South Molton): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs what is the present position of the Somali Mullah, stating the estimated number of his followers, and the amount of rifles and ammunition in his possession.

*THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Earl PERCY, Kensington, S.): We have no definite information as to the present position of the Mullah or strength of his following, and the report that he has returned to the Nogal Valley is not confirmed.

Administration of Somaliland.

MR. CHARLES HOBHOUSE: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs how many officers have been sent out in the last three months upon special service to Somaliland; whether any military operations are taking place in that country, and what force it will be necessary to maintain in the Protectorate in order to preserve peace; whether he can state what number of officers will be required in future to administer the Government there.

*EARL PERCY: No special service officers have been sent out since the termination of the war, and no military operations are now taking place. Two Indian regiments and two companies of mounted infantry will remain as a temporary garrison pending the reorganisation of the local forces. The normal European staff of the Protectorate consists of eleven civil and ten military officers.

MR. CHARLES HOBHOUSE: What was the date of the termination of the war?

*EARL PERCY said he could not give the exact date when military operations were supposed to have terminated. His Answer referred to the period when the Foreign Office took over the control.

Somaliland Protectorate Boundaries and Administration.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether His Majesty's Government contemplate any immediate demarcation of the area of the Protectorate in Somaliland which, by the Order in Council just made by His Majesty, has been placed in charge of a Commissioner; whether this Commissioner is to act under the direction of the Foreign Office, or, if not, under the direction of what Department or official, and whether he is to be in any way instructed either from Aden or from Bombay; and whether he can give the House any information as to the recent movements and present position of the Mullah.

*EARL PERCY: The Answer to the first paragraph is in the negative; the Commissioner is to act under the direction of the Foreign Office. As regards the last paragraph, I must refer the right hon. Gentleman to the reply which I have given to-day to the hon. Member for South Molton.

Sugar Convention Expenditure.

MR. SAMUEL YOUNG (Cavan, E.): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he will give the total sum and the chief details of the expenditure during the last financial year on or in connection with the Sugar Convention and the Permanent Committee at Brussels from money voted by Parliament.

*EARL PERCY: The total expenditure was about £1,200. The principal items other than expenses for maintenance and travelling are: £700 for the remuneration of the British Delegate and of the Assistant Delegate, and £140 for the British share of the expenses of the Permanent Committee.

Macedonia—European Officers of Gendarmerie.

MR. CHARLES ALLEN: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Government has acquiesced in Hilmi Pacha's circular limiting the duties of the European officers of gendarmerie in Macedonia to technical instruction of their men, and confining the right to receive complaints from the inhabitants to the civil assessors.

*EARL PERCY: In an interview with Sir N. O'Conor, the Grand Vizier stated that he was not aware that any instructions had been sent to the Inspector-General in the sense of the alleged circular alluded to by the hon. Member, and the reports of Colonel Fairholme indicate that the British officers are receiving the cordial co-operation of the Turkish authorities.

MR. HERBERT ROBERTS (Denbighshire, W.): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether his attention has been drawn to the importation into this country by German and other Continental manufacturers of quantities of sweets, particularly chocolates, containing a large percentage of proof spirit; and whether, having regard to the danger of the sale of such articles to children, the Board of Inland Revenue propose to take steps to check such sale: and whether he will state under what conditions, if any, such articles are allowed to be sold without a licence.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN, Worcestershire, E.): The hon. Member was good enough to draw my attention to this matter by a private letter. I have been in communication with the Board of Inland Revenue on the subject. The only thing that they can do is to insist that goods containing an appreciable percentage of spirit should not be sold by any person not holding a spirit retail licence, and they are issuing warnings to that effect in such cases as appear to them to require it.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): May I ask whether a proportionate duty is levied on these goods?

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: I think so.

Alcohol for Manufacturing Purposes.

MR. MACVEAGH (Down, S.): To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has yet formulated any experimental scheme for the production and sale of alcohol for manufacturing and industrial purposes; whether he is aware that alcohol can be manufactured at fourpence a gallon from such materials as bad potatoes and mildewed grain; whether his attention has been drawn to the extent of German trade in this respect; and whether he intends to allow such spirits to be blended in bonded warehouses and sold as pure whiskey.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: I am not quite clear as to what the hon. Member refers. I would, however, refer him to Section 8 of the Finance Act, 1902. I may at the same time mention that I am considering whether it would be advisable to alter the present law which prohibits the sale of methylated spirit by retailers in quantities of more than one gallon. As regards the cost of certain forms of alcohol, and its composition, and the extent of the German trade in such forms of alcohol, I have seen statements to the effect (more or less) of those made by the hon. Member, but I have no official information on the subject. And, with reference to his last Question, I have nothing to add to the reply given to the hon. Member on Wednesday the 22nd June† to a somewhat similar Question.

MR. MACVEAGH: Cannot the right hon. Gentleman get information from the Customs officials as to the extent of the German trade?

† See (4) Debates, cxxxvi., 827.

Mr. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: I do not think I can. They cannot get information as to the sources from which the spirit is obtained. When spirit is imported as silent spirit it is absolutely impossible by any analysis to say how it has been made. It is pure spirit and nothing but that.

Mr. THOMAS O'DONNELL (Kerry, W.): What is silent spirit?

Major JAMESON (Clare, W.): Cannot the right hon. Gentleman ascertain the quantity of the spirit imported from Germany.

Mr. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: Yes, I could obtain that, but I could not say how it was made, whether from potatoes or mildewed grain. I have no means of arriving at the sources from which it is manufactured.

Mr. KILBRIDE (Kildare, S.): Have you any information as to the amount of such spirit blended in the bonded warehouses and sold as whiskey?

Mails in County Fermanagh.

Mr. EDWARD MITCHELL (Fermanagh, N.): I beg to ask the Postmaster-General if he is aware that since May last mid-day mail bags from Belleek, Irvinestown, Billinamallard, and other places, have been abolished, while previous to this letters could be posted early in the day and delivered in Enniskillen at 2 o'clock p.m.; that, under the present conditions, letters posted in any of the places mentioned have necessarily to go viâ Omagh, and take a long time in delivery; and, if so, will he consider the advisabilty of improving the present postal system in the places referred to.

The POSTMASTER - GENERAL (Lord Stanley, Lancashire, Westhoughton): I will have inquiry made on the subject, and will acquaint the hon. Member with the result.

Government Education Grant—Method of Distribution.

Dr. MACNAMARA (Camberwell, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Board of Education whether he is now in a position to make a statement relative to the r presentations which have been made to him concerning the hardship to poorer schools, and especially to country schools, likely to arise under the method of distributing Government grants to elementary schools proposed under Article 31* of the Education Code for 1904–5, and relative also to the difficulties in registration which that proposed distribution will involve.

The PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY to the BOARD of EDUCATION (Sir William Anson, Oxford University): The total result of the method of distributing grants proposed in the Code would not involve a loss to local education authorities, taking the country as a whole; but it appears that some of the rural counties and some of the boroughs would incur a small, but an appreciable loss. I am of opinion that very slight improvement of attendance generally, and some better arangement as to the attendance of children under the by-laws relating to partial exemption, would cancel the losses which at present would arise in certain areas if the proposed change were carried into effect. But in view of the fact that under existing circumstances the change cannot be introduced without involving these losses the Board will revert to the system hitherto in force; at the same time they hope that in another year or two the methods proposed in the Code for 1904 may be brought into use without risk of hardship to any local education authority, rural or urban.

Dr. MACNAMARA: Will the hon. Baronet issue a Minute setting up the arrangement to which it is proposed to revert.

Irish Agricultural Organisation Society.

Mr. MURPHY (Kerry, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Department of Agriculture exercise any supervision over the annual sums granted to the Irish Agricultural Organisation Society; and by what power and authority are such sums granted, seeing that this society, aided by public money, is in direct competition with other similar societies dealing in Irish agricultural produce.

The CHIEF SECRETARY for IRELAND (Mr. Wyndham, Dover): The sums paid to the society have been in respect of the remuneration and expenses of its officials whom the Department has employed from time to time instead of appointing additional officers on its staff. No payments have been made by way of grant. The Act of 1899 authorises the Department to apply its funds, with the concurrence of the Agricultural Board, for the purposes of promoting agricultural and other rural industries.

Mr. FLYNN (Cork County, N.): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that this society is in direct competition with private enterprise all over Ireland?

Mr. WYNDHAM: I do not know if that is an accurate description, and even if it were I think the action of the society is one we ought to view with pleasure. The duty of the Department is to spend money for the promotion of agriculture, and, as I have said, it has simply employed officials of the society instead of increasing its own staff.

Land Purchase—The Macgillycuddy's Estate, County Kerry.

Mr. MURPHY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutentant of Ireland whether the attention of the Estates Commissioners has been directed to the sale of The Macgillycuddy's Estate, county Kerry, in the Land Judge's Court; whether they are aware that the holding of Mr. Daniel Shea, an evicted tenant who has made application to the Commissioners already, is situated at Cleeny on this estate, and held by the Earl of Kenmare as a middleman under The Macgillycuddy; and whether the Estates Commissioners have taken any, and, if any, what, steps to safeguard the interests of the evicted tenant.

Mr. WYNDHAM: Proceedings for sale of a portion of this estate were recently pending in the Land Judge's Court. On the application of the owner, however, proceedings were stayed, and an order was made enabling him to negotiate for a sale of the whole of the property to the Estates Commissioners. The application received from the evicted tenant will be duly considered.

Mr. MURPHY: Can we rely on the right hon. Gentleman to see that this evicted tenant is reinstated?

Mr. WYNDHAM: I have every confidence that the Commissioners will do their duty.

American Duties on Irish Cured Fish.

Mr. THOMAS O'DONNELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether any steps have been taken by the Irish Government with a view to induce the American Government to withdraw the prohibitory tariff proposed to be imposed on Irish cured fish imported into that country.

Mr. WYNDHAM: The Irish Government communicated with the Foreign Office on the subject. My noble friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs states that the alteration in the method of assessing the duty is due to a ruling by the Board of General Appraisers. Against this ruling there is a right of appeal to the Circuit Court of the district, and, under certain circumstances, a further appeal to the Supreme Court It would appear that advantage has already been taken of this right of appeal, and my noble friend does not consider that any useful purpose would be served by making representations to the United States Government at the present stage. But the matter will be closely watched and representations made when they are likely to have good results.

Mr. FLAVIN (Kerry, N.): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that this increased taxation is practically killing the Irish mackerel fishing industry?

Blennerhassett's Estate, Kerry—Case of Daniel Murphy.

MR. THOMAS O'DONNELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Estates Commissioners have received an application for reinstatement in his farm from Daniel Murphy, Dromin, Milltown, county Kerry; whether he is aware that the greater part of the estate (A. Blennerhassett's Estate) on which the farm is situated is already purchased; that the present holder of the farm (Mr. Wharton) has no judicial title; and, if so, whether steps will be taken, under the provisions of the Land Act, 1903, to have Mr. Murphy reinstated.

MR. WYNDHAM: The greater part of this property was sold some time ago to the occupiers under previous Land Purchase Acts. No application has been received by the Estates Commissioners in respect of the sale of the remainder, nor have they received any application on behalf of the reinstatement of Daniel Murphy.

Fishing Rights at Ballynahinch.

MR. SLOAN (Belfast, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the water bailiffs at Ballynahinch, county Down, continually interfere with the rights of individuals fishing either with rod or line; and will he give instructions for their interference to cease.

MR. WYNDHAM: There have, I believe, been several cases of interference by bailiffs with persons fishing legally with rod and line at this place. Further inquiries are being made in the matter by the new Department, the result of which I will communicate to my hon. friend.

Game Rights on the Clanricarde Estate, County Galway.

MR. ROCHE (Galway, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that in August or September, 1902, the Clanricarde tenants at Derrygoolan, county Galway, refused to allow strangers or poachers to trespass on their lands in pursuit of game, those tenants being in possession of their holdings for many years as tenants from year to year, and consequently the owners of the game rights on their farms; that on the 12th August, 1903, the same tenants again refused to allow strangers or poachers to shoot over their lands, although those outsiders were accompanied by police as a protection force; and whether, in view of the fact that no action has been taken since autumn, 1902, either by the landlord, Lord Clanricarde, or anybody else, to contest the tenants' right to the game on their holdings, a police protection force will be refused to any party endeavouring to shoot over these lands, to whom the tenants have refused permission.

MR. WYNDHAM: I am not informed of the particulars of events which the hon. Member states took place in 1902–1903. The attendance of police on such occasions is solely to prevent serious breaches of the peace, and is not to prevent any person entitled to a legal right from asserting it in a lawful manner. If the tenants are the aggressors and remove the so-called strangers, the latter can proceed civilly or criminally for assault. If the so-called strangers are the aggressors, then the tenants can proceed civilly before the County Court or before the magistrates for trespass in pursuit of game, and thus have the legal rights of the respective parties determined in a Court of Law. I cannot and ought not to pronounce an opinion as to the rights of the respective parties, being, as I am, in ignorance of the nature of the contract of tenancy between the landlords and tenants.

MR. KILBRIDE: Does the right hon. Gentleman deny that these tenants are tenants from year to year and were so previously to the passing of the Land Act of 1881?

MR. WYNDHAM: No.

MR. KILBRIDE: Will you inquire from the police if the statements in my Question are correct, and whether, also, an offer of 1s. per head has been made to the tenants for every bird killed?

In reply to Mr. ROCHE,

MR. WYNDHAM said the police would only go to the place if there was reason to believe that there might be a breach of the peace.

MR. KILBRIDE: What does the right hon. Gentleman think would be a lawful and legitimate protest under these circumstances?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

Larne Urban Council.

MR. JOSEPH DEVLIN (Kilkenny, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has received a memorial from the Urban Council of Larne (county Antrim) praying for an increase in the number of councillors; and, if so, will he state what action he proposes to take in the matter.

MR. WYNDHAM: The district council has made application to the county council for an increase in the number of urban councillors. It is for the county council to consider the application and, should it be of opinion that a prima facie case is made out, to cause an inquiry to be made in pursuance of Article 26 of the Application of Enactments Order.

Belfast Corporation—Outbreaks of Infectious Disease.

MR. JOSEPH DEVLIN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to a resolution passed by the Works Committee of the Belfast Corporation, held on 29th June, declaring that, owing to the serious and periodical outbreaks of infectious diseases in the City of Belfast, the attention of the Public Health Department be called to the present system of dumping the refuse, which must contain germs of disease, on ground intended for building purposes; and whether, seeing that the system has been encouraged rather than repressed by the Belfast Corporation, he will, in the interests of the health of the community, cause inquiries to be made by the Local Government Board into this practice with a view to its discontinuance.

MR. WYNDHAM: The resolution of the Works Committee is under the consideration of the Corporation. As already stated, the Local Government Board has received no complaints in the matter. The Board's Medical Inspector will, however, make inquiries.

Tobacco Growing in Ireland.

MR. DAVID MORGAN (Essex, Walthamstow): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he can furnish particulars as to the arrangements made for the experimental growing of tobacco in Ireland; and if such experimental growing will be carried on in different parts of Ireland, so that reliable trials may be made on a fairly large area of ground, in four or five different localities, thus enabling an opinion to be formed as to the results in different districts.

MR. WYNDHAM: In 1900, 1901, and 1902 experiments under the supervision of the Department were undertaken at a number of selected centres in Ireland, the results of which have satisfied the Department that the tobacco plant can be successfully cultivated in that country. In order, however, to determine the possible commercial value to the country of tobacco cultivation, arrangements were made for the growing of the crop on about twenty acres in the vicinity of Navan during the present year. Until the Department has satisfied itself with respect to the actual financial result, it will not be in a position to consider the question of the initiation of similar experiments elsewhere.

MR. FLAVIN: Has it been brought to the notice of the right hon. Gentleman that tobacco was successfully grown in Tralee. Why have not the Department experimented in more than one county?

MR. WYNDHAM: I think my Answer covers that ground.

Rathmines Commissioners and the Dublin County Council.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Local Government Board have sought the counsel and advice of the Law Officers of the Crown to guide them in their decision on the appeal of the Rathmines Commissioners against the decision of the Dublin County Council.

Mr. WYNDHAM: No, Sir. I stated in reply to a Question by the hon. Member for South Dublin on the 20th June,† that the Board has authority to obtain the opinion of counsel in important cases, and that should it become necessary to consult the Law Officers of the Crown in the present case the Attorney-General will alone advise.

Mr. SWIFT MACNEILL: Why not the Solicitor-General? Why is the exception made in this case?

Trawling in Muir Bay.

Mr. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, whether it has come to the knowledge of the Fisheries Branch of the Department of Technical and Agricultural Instruction that eight trawling boats, whose decks have been seen strewn several inches deep with fish spawn, have been constantly operating on Sundays and week days for the past month across the entrance to Muir Bay, to the loss and injury to the means of livelihood of the local fishermen; has the "Granuaile" yet made the long-promised surprise visit to the neighbourhood of Muir Bay; and what steps, if any, does the Government propose to take, with the view of securing the fishermen from deprivation of their livelihood by the illegal practice of trawling.

Mr. WYNDHAM: The waters in question are closed to trawling inside defined limits, which are locally well known; but the Department has no information that trawling has been carried out within the prohibited area. It is giving the matter close attention, however, and if an infraction of the law is brought to notice it will institute proceedings. It was only on the 25th June that a promise was given that the "Granuaile" would visit the waters. The element of surprise will disappear if the hon. Member presses me to give indications of the visit's probable date.

Blacklion Dispensary, Enniskillen Union.

Mr. JORDAN (Fermanagh, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if his attention has been drawn to the report of Dr. M'Carthy, made to the Local Government Board on the 30th May last, in reference to the condition of the Blacklion Dispensary in the Enniskillen Union, and to his statements that the rooms are filled with accumulations of old bottles and rubbish, and that vigorous action is needed to remedy this state of affairs, and as to the unsuitability of the rooms used for the dispensary for children and delicate and elderly patients; and, if so, will he take steps to compel the improvement of these premises, or insist on the guardians providing another house instead of that now occupied by the dispensary.

Mr. WYNDHAM: The attention of the guardians has been directed to this report, and the Board has no reason to doubt they will take suitable action to remedy the condition of things complained of.

Ballinasloe Union Medical Officer.

Mr. ROCHE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state on what grounds the Local Government Board has refused to sanction the increase of £10 a year to £130 in the salary of Dr. Collins, the Protestant Medical Officer of Ballinasloe Union; whether he is aware that all the Catholic guardians are in favour of the proposed increase; and whether the Local Government Board, although withholding its sanction of this increase to an experienced Poor Law officer, has sanctioned initial salaries of larger amount for medical officers without Poor Law experience.

Mr. WYNDHAM: The Board has no knowledge of the religious persuasions of Dr. Collins and the guardians. The Board refused to sanction the proposed increase of salary, because of the small amount of work recorded as having been performed in Dr. Collins' district, and in view of the fact that his salary was increased to its present amount so recently as 1902. The Board, however, expressed its willingness to consider any reasonable scale of salary which might be formulated by the guardians, and made applicable to the entire medical staff of the union.

† See (4) Debates, cxxxvi., 491.

Every case is considered on its merits, and higher initial salaries have only been allowed where they were warranted by circumstances.

MR. ROCHE: Will the right hon. Gentleman inform the Local Government Board that Dr. Collins is a medical officer, and that the increase of the salary has been voted by Catholic guardians.

MR. FLAVIN: How would the right hon. Gentleman like to have to live on £130 a year?

Irish Agricultural Department—Catholic Clerks of the Veterinary Branch.

MR. DELANY (Queen's County, Ossory): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will state how many communications (giving dates) were received at the Merrion Street offices of the Agricultural Department, from the Catholic clerks of the veterinary branch since 1st April, 1900, in reference to their position; how many of these communications were registered as official documents, and on what dates were they respectively registered; and on what dates respectively were these communications replied to.

MR. WYNDHAM: Several communications have been received by the Department from temporary clerks formerly employed in the veterinary branch, and transferred to the new Department. Their religions are unknown to the Department. The communications were duly registered as official documents, and were duly answered. I have already replied to numerous Questions addressed to me respecting the position of these clerks. It would be subversive of official discipline, and opposed to precedent, to enter into details of the character suggested by the hon. Member, and I must decline, in the circumstances, to give the information he desires.

MR. WYNDHAM: The hon. Member has no right to say any disability is imposed.

MR. DELANY: I am only suggesting what I am in a position to prove?

Labourers (Ireland) Act—Cost of Registration of Title.

MR. O'SHEE (Waterford, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that, in the case of lands acquired in fee under the Labourers (Ireland) Act, the Local Government Board issued a circular or letter to rural sanitary authorities, calling their attention to the desirability of having the title to the plots registered under the Local Registration of Title (Ireland) Act, 1891; and whether, seeing that the average cost of registering the title to each plot is between £5 and £6, he will consider legislation with a view to providing for free registration of the title to these plots as of holdings purchased under the Land Purchase Acts.

MR. WYNDHAM: I have ascertained that no circular of the character mentioned has been issued by the Local Government Board, the Land Commission, or the Registrar of Titles. The maximum fees payable in the Registry of Titles in respect of any such registration as that referred to amount to 13s. only.

The Anglo-French Convention.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury when it is proposed to exchange the ratifications of the Convention between England and France of 8th April, 1904, relative to Newfoundland, the Gambia, the Isles de Los, the Niger, and Lake Chad; in case the Convention should not be ratified, will the stipulations it contains in Articles IV. to VIII. as to the Gambia, the Isles de Los, the Niger, and Lake Chad becomes inoperative as well as the stipulations in Articles I. to III. as to Newfoundland; and have any steps been, or are any being, taken to carry out the Articles IV. to VIII.

The following Questions also appeared on the Paper—

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury are the two Declarations, one respecting Egypt and Morocco and the other concerning Siam, Madagascar, and the New Hebrides, essential parts of the Agreement with France represented by those two Declarations and by the Convention of 8th April, 1904, relating to Newfoundland, the Gambia, and the Niger; and is it understood between His Majesty's Government and the French Government that the two Declarations will retain their effect and be carried into execution even in case the Convention fails to be ratified.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, have the Government of Newfoundland made any representation to His Majesty's Government or raised any difficulties affecting the rights conceded to the French under Article II. of the Anglo-French Convention of 8th April, 1904, in respect of Newfoundland local regulations as to bait, fishing, or access to ports on the so-called French shore, or in respect of the policing of the fishing; and was any agreement come to by His Majesty's Government with the Government of Newfoundland on these points before the Convention was signed.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): Perhaps my hon. friend will be good enough to postpone, say for ten days, any Question upon this subject. I do not think it would be in the public interest that I should at this moment give a reply by way of Question and Answer across the floor of the House.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: Does that refer to all my Questions?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes; they all relate, more or less directly, to the Anglo-French Agreement, and I am inclined to think that it would be desirable, if my hon. friend sees no objection, to defer them for the time I have suggested.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES assented to the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman, but added that, in view of the extreme gravity of the situation that might arise, he would put the Questions down again a fortnight hence.

Labourers (Ireland) Act Amendment Bill.

MR. JOHN REDMOND (Waterford): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury what course the Government intend to take with reference to the Irish Labourers Bill; and whether they have considered the desirability of referring the Bill to one of the Grand Committees.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I see no objection to referring the Irish Labourers Bill to one of the Grand Committees in the present condition of public business.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes, Sir, I will?

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): To which Committee will it be sent?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am afraid I cannot answer that, nor is it necessary I should do so at the present moment, but the information will be forthcoming when the Motion is made.

MR. JOHN REDMOND: Until the Aliens Bill is disposed of, it is undesirable to send this Bill to the Grand Committee on Law.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Of course, the condition of business in the Grand Committees must be one of the governing considerations in determining to which Committee the Bill should be sent.

Budget Proposals affecting Stripped Tobacco.

MR. CHARLES McARTHUR (Liverpool, Exchange): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, having regard to the disorganisation of the tobacco trade and almost complete cessation of dealings in stripped tobacco, as shown by monthly circulars, by reason of proposed fiscal changes, he can expedite the resumption of the debate on the Budget proposals affecting tobacco.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am as well aware as my hon. friend of the inconveniences which have resulted from the postponement of the Budget. I hope to take it on the first complete Parliamentary day on which we do not take the present stage of the Licensing Bill.

Committee of National Defence.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury in what capacity and for what reason did Lord Curzon attend and take part in the proceedings of the Committee of the Cabinet for National Defence; and whether there is any, and, if so, what, precedent for a gentleman without special naval and military experience, who is not a member of the Cabinet, taking part in the proceedings of a Committee of the Cabinet or of the Cabinet as a whole.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Committee of Defence have the right, and I think a most valuable right, to summon to their councils anybody whom they think will assist them in their deliberations.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Did Lord Curzon attend as Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No.

Passive Resisters.

MR. ALFRED DAVIES (Carmarthen Boroughs): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he will hold an inquiry by Royal Commission or otherwise into the grievances of the 22,000 ratepayers who have refused to pay rates under the Education Acts of 1902 and 1903; and, if not, will he say what course he intends adopting to remove the grievances of those who object conscientiously to the provisions of these Acts.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have never been able to understand that there were any grievances.

MR. ALFRED DAVIES: It is well known that there are grievances, so I press for a further reply.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It is not known to me.

MR. ALFRED DAVIES: May I ask what action will be taken with respect to the 22,000 ratepayers who have refused to pay the rates—putting aside the question whether or not they have a grievance.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I suppose that rests with the rating authorities.

The Operations in Tibet.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Government has received any information this morning with reference to the operations in Tibet.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Perhaps my hon. friend will put down a Question to my right hon. friend the Secretary of State for India, who is not now in his place.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs): But is there not important news to-day which the House should have?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think the right hon. Gentleman will agree with me that to ask me, without notice, at five minutes to 3 o'clock, and in the absence of my right hon. friend the Secretary of State for India, to give the House an account of events in Tibet, is a bit unreasonable. If I had had the smallest notice that such a Question was going to be asked I should have brought down the necessary documents.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I thought it was not unusual, except in matters involving complicated negotiations, to ask a Question without notice on incidents occurring from day to day.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I did not bring down the telegram, but if I had been told, even ten minutes ago, that a Question was going to be asked, I would have sent for it. But it so happens that a right hon. friend of mine has got it, and I see no reason why I should not read it to the House. But of course I could not be expected to bring it down, and I think that to repeat from memory a telegram of such a character would be setting a very evil precedent. The telegram is as follows—

"Younghusband reports that to-day he sent two messengers to Tibetans that signal gun would be fired at 12 o'clock, and that if fort was not surrendered firing would commence at 12.30. The delegates—Tongsa Penlop and Ta Lama—women and children were warned to leave fort. No notice was taken by Tibetans there, and at 12.38 firing on the fort commenced."

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs): I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman what Votes will be taken to-morrow and Thursday in next week, as well as the business for Friday.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: Irish Estimates will be taken to-morrow, the Votes being those for the Land Commission, the Board of Works, and the Chief Secretary's salary. Under any circumstances the Chief Secretary's salary will be the first Order at the evening sitting. In response to the earnest request made to me by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Somerset, Friday will not be an allotted day to the Licensing Bill, and I therefore propose to take the Irish Land Bill and the reference to a Grand Committee of the Irish Labourers Bill.

Mr. JOHN REDMOND: I presume the reference of the Labourers Bill will be the first Order?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: There is probably a good deal to be said in favour of that.

Mr. WILLIAM MOORE (Antrim, N.): As the Labourers Bill is likely to be bitterly opposed by hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House, will the right hon. Gentleman put that second Order.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR was understood to express a hope that the opposition would not be of undue length.

Mr. GIBSON BOWLES: As to the Cunard agreement?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I am not yet able to make any statement as to the debate on the Cunard agreement.

ACCESS TO AND FROM THE HOUSE.

Mr. LOUIS SINCLAIR (Essex, Romford) said he desired to draw the attention of the Speaker to Sessional Order No. 11, and to ask him to interpret and clearly define the meaning of it.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am not called upon to give interpretations of the Sessional Orders unless an occasion arises. The hon. Member must first show that he is raising some question of privilege or Order.

Mr. LOUIS SINCLAIR said he was raising a question of privilege on Sessional Order No. 11. That Order was as follows—

> "Ordered, that the Commissioners of the Police of the Metropolis do take care that, during the session of Parliament, the passages through the streets leading to this House be kept free and open, and that no obstruction be permitted to hinder the passage of Members to and from this House"

He was proceeding from that House to his home on 12th May, and on the near side of the road in Regent-street the roadway was entirely obstructed by a hose, making it impossible for him to proceed on the near side of the road without either going over the hose or waiting until the obstruction was removed. He thereupon drove on the off side of the road, and as soon as possible returned to the near side. When he stated the case to the magistrate as a question of privilege, the magistrate dismissed the question of the Sessional Order, saying, "We all know what that means." He desired to know whether hon. Members were allowed to exercise that privilege conferred by the Sessional Order, and to what distance the privilege extended from the Houses of Parliament. This was the first time he had ever been fined; he would have waited until the obstruction was removed rather than go on the wrong side of the road, if he had not believed that he was within his rights and could have free access to and from the House. He claimed that privilege as a Member of that House and as a law-abiding citizen.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the House will agree with me that it would have been better, perhaps, if the hon. Member had kept on the right side of the road. I do not think the House will expect me to leave this to them as a question of privilege; it seems to be an ordinary police case. Wherever the line is to be drawn under this Standing Order, it does not extend to an indefinite distance from the Houses of Parliament—there must be some limits to it—and I think that, in the ordinary sense of the words, an hon. Member driving up Regent Street about an hour after the House had risen could scarcely expect to come within the operation of the Order.

MR. LOUIS SINCLAIR said he had not, perhaps, made himself clear. Mr. Speaker said that he ought to have waited or gone on the right side of the road; but he could not because it was obstructed.

*MR. SPEAKER: I only referred to what the hon. Member had said, that, finding he could not keep on the right side he went on the wrong side, relying on this Order. I said that I thought it would have been better if he had kept to the right side instead of relying upon the Order.

LICENSING BILL [1ST ALLOTTED DAY].

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1:—

Amendment again proposed—

Question again proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR JAMES WOODHOUSE (Huddersfield): I have to ask leave to withdraw this Amendment in view of the promise of the Solicitor-General to consider this question.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR ROBERT REID (Dumfries Burghs) moved an Amendment with the object of allowing the magistrates to take into consideration not one isolated reason for non-renewal of a licence, but a combination of reasons, as they had hitherto done. He said it was desirable to retain unimpaired the elasticity of discretion which the magistrates now possessed, and he wanted to insure that in future they should be able to take into consideration not one isolated reason for non-renewal but a combination of reasons. Obviously it weakened the power of the magistrates to insist on the maintenance of good order to split their discretion up into water-tight compartments.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 1, line 9, after the words last inserted, to insert the words 'or any of the before-mentioned grounds in combination with any other ground.'"—(Sir Robert Reid.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE SOLICITOR-GENERAL (Sir EDWARD CARSON, Dublin University) said the Government could not accept the Amendment. It would be very unfair to the licence-holder to tell him that his licence was being taken away partly on grounds for which he ought to get compensation and partly on grounds for which he ought not to get compensation, and that, therefore, he would get no compensation. It was impossible under the scheme of the Bill that such an arrangement could be set up.

MR. WHITLEY (Halifax) suggested that the Amendment might be modified so that no grounds outside those contained in the Bill should be brought in. That would go some way to meet the strong feeling on his side of the House. The point was this. There might not be strong enough evidence on any one single ground to justify the refusal of the renewal, yet the evidence on these grounds combined might suffice for taking away a licence without compensation. All they desired was to enable the magistrates to deal with the three grounds in combination.

SIR EDWARD CARSON said there was nothing to prevent the magistrates from taking one, two, or three grounds and putting them together, but these grounds ought, in fact, to exist; they ought not to be able] to add together three incomplete grounds in order to make one complete ground.

SIR ROBERT REID said the result of the clause was to entirely alter the practice of the past. A house might have been bad structurally or the tenant might have misconducted it, but there had been hitherto a free discretion on the part of the magistrates in dealing with such cases and by the refusal of this Amendment the existing practice would be subverted.

MR. WHITTAKER (Yorkshire, W.R., Spen Valley) said this was a very important point, and it was necessary the country should know what was being done. Justices at present very frequently refused the renewal of a licence on several grounds, and the combination of grounds was the ground of refusal. The Government's attitude was an illustration of the way in which the power of the justices was going to be materially limited, hampered, and checked. In his opinion the compensation should be limited to the cases where the renewal was refused solely because the house was not required.

MR. GROVES (Salford, S.) hoped the Government would not give way on this point. If the licence-holder committed offences the magistrates would be able to exercise their powers as in the past; it was only to the point of compensation that the provision under discussion was directed. If the Amendment were accepted, they would, he feared, find that in nine cases out of ten trivial complaints would be combined in the manner suggested in order to depreciate the amount of compensation.

MR. TOMKINSON (Cheshire, Crewe) said he had in his mind a case that came before the Bench of which he was chairman, in which the representative of the sanitary authority objected to the renewal of a licence on the ground that the holder had persistently refused to provide a proper water supply. The justices, in the exercise of the power which they at present possessed, gave the licensee a certain time within which to remedy the defect. He was contumacious, and it was only when, as a last resource, the withdrawal of the licence was threatened that he agreed to equip his house with a proper water supply. He feared that under the clause as it stood the power to exercise such pressure would be taken away from the justices.

SIR EDWARD CARSON assured the hon. Gentleman that the case he had mentioned would not come within the Bill.

SIR ARTHUR BIGNOLD (Wick Burghs) stated that during the past year only 210 licences, out of a total of 99,450, were suppressed for duplicate reasons; and in only fifty cases was the ground of non-requirement united with misbehaviour or structural deficiency. He mentioned that in order to show that in the past these considerations had not acted very powerfully in deciding the question of the renewal or refusal of a licence.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) pointed out that there was nothing compelling quarter sessions to adopt this compensation scheme. There might be large districts where they would decline to adopt it. In that case, was it possible that the Government were contemplating arresting the action of the magistrates and impairing their discretion where compensation did not arise at all?

SIR ROBERT REID: And without leaving anybody else in authority to exercise discretion.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Yes. Continuing, the hon. Member said that the Government by refusing to accept this Amendment would be crippling the present power of the justices. The Government raised, in defence of that, that these people were entitled to compensation, and therefore they could not shut them out without depriving them of compensation. His point was this: Let them take an area, the quarter sessions of which would not put this Act into operation at all. Was it not quite clear that this Bill would stand nevertheless, and that it would cripple the present power of the justices. He knew that that was the object of the brewers; but why should it be the object of the Government?

SIR EDWARD CARSON replied that he did not know whether that was a proper way to put the question, but he was quite willing to answer the substance without admitting any of the deductions which the hon. Member had made. The Question which the hon. Member asked came to this: the quarter sessions might refuse to adopt the compensation clause. If they had an area not willing to take away licences, what did it matter whether they put in two, three, or four reasons?

Mr. T. W. RUSSELL: But you are taking power from the local justices who do think there ought to be a reduction.

Sir EDWARD CARSON said there, again, his hon. friend was entirely in error. Any licence-holder might appeal against a refusal to renew a licence.

Mr. T. W. RUSSELL: I know.

Sir EDWARD CARSON, continuing, said, if a county had a body of quarter sessions who were not prepared to adopt the clause or reduce licences it would be because they thought it was not necessary to reduce them. At all events, if they had a tribunal of that kind with important functions, not merely in relation to licences but to other matters, they must show some confidence in them.

Lord EDMUND FITZMAURICE (Wiltshire, Cricklade) held that the Committee was justified in calling attention at the earliest possible moment to the extraordinary position in which Courts of the quarter sessions would be placed. It seemed to be suggested that they would have to meet beforehand to decide whether or not they would put the Act in force. As chairman of quarter sessions he was one of those who would have to administer the Act, and he was bound to say that their position would be totally different from that adumbrated by the Solicitor-General. In his opinion they would deal with each case as it arose and would not beforehand pass any resolution stating whether or not the Act should be enforced. But what would be the position if there were no compensation fund established? Would the justices not be in the ridiculous position of having their hands tied? The speech of the Solicitor-General would almost encourage quarter sessions to pass a resolution saying they did not approve of the Bill.

Lord EDMUND FITZMAURICE said that the Bill, while setting up elaborate machinery for the establishment of a compensation fund, put in possession of the Court a power which, if it chose to exercise it, would absolutely nullify the measure. In any case, until the compensation fund grew, they would have the absurd state of things that in one county—a rich one—the Act would be in operation and in the next county—a poor one—it would be a dead letter.

*Mr. AUSTIN TAYLOR (Liverpool, East Toxteth) said the point was that there was a possibility under Clause 3, that quarter sessions might not put into operation the levy for the purposes of compensation, and if they declined to do that they would have no fund available for compensation for the refusal to renew redundant licences. But that difficulty might be met by making it incumbent on quarter sessions to raise a compensation fund. When that was done it would still be open to quarter sessions to refuse to confirm the decision of the justices in regard to any particular licence. The position of the justices would not be altered. At present their decisions were subject to appeal. He agreed with the right hon. Gentleman as to the vice from a temperance point of view of this particular clause. But they had debated it over and over again. The Government, by restricting the grounds upon which magistrates might refuse to renew licences to three—each of which he gathered from the Solicitor-General must be sufficient in itself as a ground of refusal—were most effectually crippling the powers of the magistrates with regard to the exercise of their magisterial discretion. It was impossible to accede to these compensation proposals without modifying in some way the absolute discretion of the magistrates, but he thought the difficulty might be met in the way suggested by the hon. Member for Carnarvon—by giving the magistrates power to make by-laws subject to an appeal to the Secretary of State. By that method the trade would be protected against the eccentricities of "cranky" Benches, to which the Prime Minister recentlyreferred. The discussion, however, was being carried on under the shadow of the guillotine, that most perfect instrument of Parliamentary despotism, of which neither political Party could claim an absolute majority. That being so, it was necessary to make the most of the time that remained, and not go over the same ground two or three times. He therefore hoped the Amendment would be withdrawn.

COLONEL PILKINGTON (Lancashire, Newton) was understood to urge that the word "shall" should be inserted when Clause 3 came to be discussed. Quarter sessions would no doubt do their duty but he thought it advisable that the raising of the compensation fund should be made compulsory.

SIR ROBERT REID, in order to save time, asked leave to withdraw the Amendment.

Leave refused.
